I saw in the public press a statement that a veteran having a thousand-dollar certificate, if he should cash it immediately, under the terms of the Harrison bill would get about $750. If he let the certificate run until it matured by law in 1942, on the average he would get $1,125. In other words, this bill penalizes the poor soldier $250 on the thousand, and gives to the rich soldier $125 on the thousand in the form of a subsidy.

I cannot understand how the Congress could make that distinction, and I am opposed to such a provision.

Mr. President, it was admitted on the floor this morning that the Harrison bill reduces the amount due the soldiers by over $1,000,000,000—to be exact, $1,100,000,000. If the Harrison bill should be passed, the pay of these soldiers could be adjusted for $1,100,000,000 less money. Of course, that is a saving to the Treasury, but it is likewise taking that much money from the veterans of the United States; and I am opposed to that provision. I am opposed to the Harrison bill, and I am going to vote for the Patman bill when it comes before the Senate.

The Harrison bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the veterans either in bonds, if they prefer bonds; or, if they wish to turn in the certificates and secure the cash, the Secretary is authorized to sell bonds under the existing law and raise money and settle with the veterans on the basis of a cash payment.

Mr. President, I propose to support and offer, if necessary, some amendments to the Harrison bill. I propose first to move back the 20-year period to begin on the date war was declared, April 6, 1917, and make the 20-year period end on April 6, 1937, which is less than 2 years hence.

I shall do that, as I stated a moment ago, because every soldier in the Regular Army was in the Army at that time. Two hundred and fifty thousand soldiers of the National Guard were called to the colors on that day. Every male citizen of military age had served upon him constructive notice, when war was declared, that he was subject to be called to the colors. He must have begun to make his plans accordingly; and as this is purely an arbitrary matter, I shall make a motion to move the beginning date back 18 months prior to the date to which the Harrison proposal proposes to move it back. Under the Harrison bill it starts on Armistice Day, November 11, 1918. I shall move to put it back to April 6, 1917, and have the 20-year period start 18 months before it would start under the Harrison proposal.

I shall make a motion, if some other Senator does not, to restore to the adjustment of each certificate the $60 which was arbitrarily deducted from the amount found to be due each soldier.

I shall move to amend the Harrison proposal by the cancelation of all interest. I shall do that on the theory that when the soldiers borrowed upon their certificates they could only borrow, in the last analysis, one-half; but when they had the right to borrow one-half, more than one-half the period had expired from the time when the war was declared, or when the war ended, for that matter, until the time they borrowed the money. They could borrow only one-half. More than one-half the time had expired. More than one-half the amount due them had been earned. So, as I construe the matter, the soldiers were forced to pay interest on money already in equity due them. I contend that is not fair. At least, it is not just; it is not governmentally honest.

I shall make another motion, if no other Senator does, that the certificates may be discounted if the soldier wishes to get his money immediately, but that the rate of discount shall be that of the unearned interest.

Mr. President, I shall offer another amendment to the Harrison proposal; namely, to pay the soldiers in cash, to pay them immediately, and to pay them in full. This proposal brings us again to the money question. I think I showed a few moments ago that the Government can pay the veterans in cash with the best money in the world. It will be the same kind of money that we now have in circulation. It will be money backed by gold and silver, one dollar back of each "printing-press dollar", so-called.

I am in favor of the payment of the bonus in cash. Of course, as I said a moment ago, the soldiers are not particular, so far as they are concerned. They would just as soon have a good check of the United States Government, the kind the country is now full of, as to have $20 bills or to have $100 bills; and, so, the veterans are not particularly interested in the kind of payments they shall receive. I doubt if they would want to receive the amount due them in silver dollars. They would be glad to take them, but would prefer a check to silver dollars. No doubt many of them might prefer a check to receiving currency. I am in favor of paying in currency, not because the soldiers want it, not because it will help the soldiers, but because I believe that the putting the money in the form of currency into circulation will help the nonsoldiers far more than it will help the soldier himself.

I make the statement that the payment now of the bonus in cash will be of far more benefit to the 125,000,000 nonsoldiers than to the three or four million soldiers themselves. The soldier has $500 due him or $1,000 due him; he gets a check or he gets the money. He has bills to pay; he either pays his bills or deposits the money in the bank. They are just dollars to the soldier. The payment by check does not increase the circulation; it does not increase the price of commodities; it has no effect upon the price of commodities. During the past 2 or 3 years the Government has put out ten or fifteen billion dollars of that kind of money—bonds and check or deposit money—and yet some commodities are away below the cost of production. So I am contending that it is the duty of the Government to provide more money and place that money in circulation, to the end that money may become more plentiful and thereby cheaper; and to the extent money becomes cheaper, prices will go up. That is what I favor.

Mr. President, we will never get out of the depression, in my judgment, until prices are raised. There is no chance for banks to commence making loans until the people of the United States make money, and the people cannot make money on the present price level. The cotton farmers cannot raise cotton at 10 or 11 cents a pound and make any money; the wheat farmers cannot raise wheat at ninety-odd cents a bushel and make any money, when there is deducted from the 90-cent price the cost of transportation, the cost of insurance, and the cost of handling. There is no profit left; and, because the farmers are not making money, they have no credit at the banks.

But just the moment the farmers commence making money the farmers will have credit at the banks.

In the past 30 or 60 days hogs have risen in price; livestock has gone up in value. Now there is no place in the country where men who have livestock have not credit at the banks. In my section, in the livestock area, a hog section, the depression is over. If we will bring about the same condition in the Wheat Belt, in the Wheat Belt the depression will be over; if we will bring about the same condition in the cotton-producing South, the depression in that section will be over. As soon as prices are raised, there will be a profit in production; farmers can borrow money at the banks; and throughout the country, by and large, the farmers have a very large share in the banking deposits of the Nation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. How does the Senator explain the increase in the prices of hogs and cattle?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. First, by the program of the Government in killing off six and a half or seven million pigs and hogs, limiting the production, thus making hogs scarce and making the law of supply and demand operate.

Mr. BORAH. That program resulted in the man who got a better price having fewer hogs to sell.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct, but that was not my program. The Government made the hogs scarce; it made the price of hogs high. The Government has made wheat scarce and made the price of wheat high; the Government has made corn scarce and made the price of corn high; and the Government has made money scarce and has made money high. The reverse process should have been followed. If it be desired to make hogs high and wheat high and cotton high the Government would accomplish that purpose by making money plentiful and making money cheap. It does not do the farmer any good to have a great quantity of wheat if he can get nothing for it. It does not do the farmer any good to have a high price for wheat unless he has wheat to sell.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I observed in press dispatches some 2 days ago that a large quantity of corn had been shipped from Argentina to the United States and up the Mississippi into the great Corn Belt of the United States and sold there.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I was not aware of the fact. If corn is getting scarce, of course, those who have to buy corn want to get cheap corn, and if they can buy corn in Argentina or some other foreign country at prices at which they can ship it to America, pay the tariff, if there be a tariff, and have that corn delivered to them at a less price than they can buy it here in America, they are going to do it; but that gets back again to the law of supply and demand.

Mr. BORAH. It is pretty hard on the farmer though.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Absolutely; I agree with the Senator in that respect.

Mr. President, the Vinson bill will help each one of the 125,000,000 American citizens far more than it will help the soldier himself. Take, for example, the old farmer who has 160 acres at some place in the West and who raises nothing but wheat. He has a son who was called to the colors a few years ago; the son went to the war and came back. The son later received a thousand-dollar certificate; he has borrowed $500 on that certificate, and all he can possibly get now is $500. Pass the Vinson bill and he would receive $500; pass the Patman bill and he would receive $487; pass the Harrison bill and he would receive $180; that is all the soldier could obtain under the terms of the respective bills, if any of them should be passed; but the old father still has his farm. If the Patman bill should be passed, it would put $2,000,000,000 in circulation; it would make money more plentiful; it would make money cheaper; it would raise prices. The old farmer perhaps raises two or three thousand bushels of wheat each year. It would raise the price of wheat. If it should raise the price of wheat 50 cents a bushel, and the farmer raised 2,000 bushels of wheat, there is a thousand-dollar profit next year to the father of the soldier boy, although the soldier boy would get only $180 under the Harrison bill, $487 under the Patman bill and $500 under the Vinson bill. That is all he could possibly get. The father, however, because of the higher price for wheat, would receive double the amount the soldier could possibly receive. That is for the next year. The next year it would be the same, or should be the same, and the year following that it should be the same. The farmer would receive a high price for his wheat and high prices for the other commodities he produces on his farm, and when he gets higher prices for his wheat then the farm itself goes up in value; perhaps the farm will double in value. With profitable prices a farm now worth three or four thousand dollars, embracing 160 acres, might increase in value to six or seven thousand dollars.

Mr. President, I am supporting the Patman bill and the cash-payment plan, so as to help the nonsoldiers by placing money in circulation, by making money more plentiful, by making money cheaper. I am not for cheap money; I am not asking to go back to the cheap money we had in 1920, when the dollar was worth only 64 cents measured by the best standard of value we have; but I think we should go back to at least 1926, when the dollar had a reasonable value, a value that enabled commodity prices to show a profit to the producer. In 1926 wheat was selling for $1.40 or $1.60 a bushel, corn was selling around $1 a bushel, cotton was selling around 20 cents a pound, and livestock prices were in proportion. With such prices as these, farmers can produce commodities and pay the cost of production and have a profit, and with such profit they can pay their taxes; they can pay interest on their farm loan, if they have one; they can buy a new automobile ever so often; their purchasing power is increased, and that makes business for the stores; it makes business for the banker; it makes good business for everyone. I am not afraid of making the statement that this Nation will never get out of the depression until the price level is substantially raised, and it can only be raised by cheapening the dollar. The Government can cheapen the dollar. Why it does not do so, I am not advised. Suffice it to say it has not cheapened the dollar. The dollar on yesterday was worth 124½ cents.

Mr. President, we read in the public press constantly that the currencies of the world should be stabilized; that nations should stabilize not only their own currencies, but should likewise stabilize the currencies of other nations. Mr. President, national monetary systems are individual affairs. The money question in each country is the problem of that country. We have no jurisdiction over the value of the pound in Great Britain, except incidentally; we have no jurisdiction over the value of the monetary units of other nations; that is their domestic problem; but the value of the dollar in America is our domestic problem; and we have the power, and the Congress has the command, to regulate the value of the dollar in the best interest of the people of the Nation. It is impossible for the United States even to talk about stabilization of the dollar. We have today a dollar abroad which is worth 60 cents and a dollar at home which is worth 124½ cents. Which dollar are we going to stabilize?

The United States is in no position even to consider stabilization of the dollar. We will not be in a position to stabilize the dollar until other nations are likewise ready to stabilize their monetary units; and I know of no nation that is ready to stabilize, unless, perchance, it be France and Switzerland, which are still lingering along on the old gold standard. They might be very glad to try to keep the present value of their monetary units, but, aside from those two countries, there is no nation in the world, so far as I know, which at this time is in a position even to consider stabilizing the value of its monetary unit. Most certainly England is not today ready to consider stabilization. England does not know at what point she wishes to fix the value of the pound. England is going through a period of experimentation. When Great Britain arrives at that point in her self-consciousness when she has the pound fixed at a value that will best serve her domestic economy, England will consider the stabilization of the pound in terms of gold. The United States is in the same position. Today we are not in a position seriously to consider the stabilization of the dollar.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	King	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Copeland	La Follette	Robinson
Austin	Costigan	Lewis	Russell
Bachman	Couzens	Logan	Schall
Bailey	Dickinson	Lonergan	Schwellenbach
Bankhead	Dieterich	Long	Sheppard
Barbour	Donahey	McAdoo	Shipstead
Barkley	Duffy	McCarran	Smith
Bilbo	Fletcher	McGill	Steiwer
Black	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bone	Gerry	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Borah	Gibson	Metcalf	Townsend
Brown	Glass	Minton	Trammell
Bulkley	Gore	Moore	Truman
Bulow	Guffey	Murphy	Tydings
Burke	Hale	Murray	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Harrison	Neely	Van Nuys
Capper	Hastings	Nye	Wagner
Caraway	Hatch	O'Mahoney	Walsh
Carey	Hayden	Overton	Wheeler
Clark	Johnson	Pittman	White
Connally	Keyes	Pope

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in order to straighten out the parliamentary situation I now desire to offer formally the amendment which I submitted this morning in behalf of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and myself as a substitute for the committee amendment, and which I then asked to have lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state his understanding of the parliamentary situation so that the Senate may understand it. The Finance Committee has reported a bill with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting certain matter. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I have already discussed to some extent the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Missouri, which is the so-called "Vinson bill."

Before a quorum was demanded I was making some comment upon the world stabilization of currency. I stated that no nation is today ready to undertake the stabilization of its currency. Most assuredly the United States is not in a position to stabilize the dollar at its present value. Great Britain is not ready to stabilize the value of the pound in terms of gold at its present value. The countries on the silver standard are not ready today to consider the stabilization of their silver units.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I do.

Mr. LONG. Earlier in the day I propounded to the President pro tempore of the Senate a parliamentary inquiry, which I now ask permission to propound again to the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. The Vinson bill, which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] have offered as a substitute for the committee amendment, if it should be adopted, would stand in lieu of the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would stand in lieu of what is known as the "Harrison amendment."

Mr. LONG. Then the vote would come, would it not, on whether the amendment should prevail over the Patman bill; that is, the House bill? It would still require another vote as between the two, would it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate should adopt the Clark substitute for the committee amendment, then the question would come upon whether or not the Senate should adopt the amendment as substituted; and that would be a contest between the so-called "Vinson amendment" and the Patman amendment.

Mr. LONG. That is what I desired to know.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the issue has shifted, and the contest now is between the Vinson bill and the Harrison bill. When the vote shall come, the Senate will vote as to whether they prefer the Vinson bill or whether they prefer the Harrison bill. If the motion made by the distinguished Senator from Missouri should carry, the Vinson bill would take its status before the Senate in exactly the same position which the Harrison bill now occupies, and the Vinson bill would be subject to amendment. If the Vinson bill should become the unfinished business by having its text adopted, it would be subject to further amendment, and later on we should have a chance to vote as between the Vinson bill and the Patman bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Without undertaking to differ from the Chair, I will state my understanding of the parliamentary situation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I will say to the Senator that I was slightly in error.

Mr. CLARK. The committee has substituted the so-called "Harrison bill." The committee amendment strikes out all after the enacting clause of the House bill, which is the Patman bill, and offers the Harrison bill as a substitute. I have offered the Vinson bill as a substitute for the committee amendment. Under general parliamentary law, as I understand, amendments to the so-called "Harrison bill"—that is, the committee amendment—are first in order. Amendments to the so-called "substitute", the Vinson bill, are then in order. Then the vote would recur on substituting the Vinson bill for the Harrison bill. If the motion to substitute the Vinson bill for the Harrison bill should be adopted, further amendment would not then be in order to the Vinson bill; but if the motion to substitute the Vinson bill for the Harrison bill should be rejected, then further amendments to the Harrison bill would be in order, or any further substitute for the committee amendment which any Senator desired to offer would be in order.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, if we should adopt the Clark amendment—the Vinson bill—as a substitute for the Harrison bill, then the vote would come on whether or not the committee amendment, as substituted by the Vinson bill, should prevail as against the House bill?

Mr. CLARK. Of course, any substitute for the original House bill would then have to be voted on; and the Senate would always have an opportunity to adhere to the House bill or to adopt any substitute or any amendment it might see fit.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, to simplify the matter, the contest now is between the Vinson bill and the Harrison bill. The Vinson bill proposes to pay the soldiers at some time in the future, and that time will be when the Congress makes an appropriation to pay the amount. The Harrison bill proposes to pay the soldiers now by discounting the amount due them and by giving them either bonds or cash; but the Harrison bill deprives the soldiers, in mass, of $1,100,000,000 of the amount due them under the terms of the law. Because of that condition—cutting down the amount due the soldiers by $1,100,000,000—I am opposed to the Harrison bill. I am opposed to the Vinson bill because it makes no provision for paying the soldiers; and as between these two bills I have no choice, because, in the last analysis, I shall vote for the original Patman bill.

Mr. President, I was discussing briefly the question of stabilization of money. I think everyone agrees that the world can make no particular progress toward getting out of the depression until world currencies shall be stabilized, and at this particular time no country seems to be able or ready to consider stabilization. The countries which want stabilization are unable to bring it about. There may be some nations somewhere which are satisfied with the present value of their monetary unit. If so, they are ready for stabilization; but most certainly the larger countries are not ready for stabilization. The United States is not ready, Great Britain is not ready; and those two countries have a very large part to play in the regulation and management of world currencies.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Before the Senator retires from the floor I desire to ask him a question, because we recognize him as quite a leader on both the bonus question and the inflation question in the Senate. Our best course seems to be this, does it not—that we ought to vote for the Vinson bill as a substitute for the Harrison bill, and then vote for the Patman bill over the Vinson bill? That would be our best course; would it?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I agree to that line of strategy. As between the Vinson bill and the Harrison bill, there is no choice for the friends of the soldier. The Senator who votes for the Harrison bill votes to cut practically in two each certificate in the hands of each soldier of the Nation. The Senator who votes for the Vinson bill votes to pay the soldier the full amount of his certificate at some time in the future. If we can defeat the Harrison bill and can adopt the Vinson bill as a substitute for the Harrison bill, we can at least go on record in favor of paying the soldiers the full amount due on their certificates; and I shall take that course. Then, if we should pass the Vinson bill, and the Vinson bill should become the law, at some future date, on some deficiency bill, perhaps we might have the power to attach an amendment appropriating the money to pay the soldiers in accordance with the terms of the Vinson bill.

Mr. LONG. But the ideal solution would be this, as I understand the Senator: If we adopt the Vinson bill in lieu of the Harrison amendment, and then, when the question reverts as between the Patman bill and the Vinson bill, adopt the Patman bill, we shall have a complete solution of the whole thing in one bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, as I understand the situation and the interest of the veterans, when my name shall be called, I shall vote for the Vinson bill as against the Harrison bill. If the Vinson bill shall carry, then the contest will come between the Vinson bill and the Patman bill; and as between those two bills I shall vote for the Patman bill. I think that makes the matter plain from my standpoint.

Mr. President, it is apparent that Senators are not greatly interested in this matter. I take it for granted that each one knows exactly how he is going to vote, and, knowing how he expects to vote, he is not interested in staying upon the floor to listen to explanations or questions or speeches that would not, under any conditions, influence his vote. If I can have distinctly understood what is the issue before the Senate, I shall take no further time to explain my understanding of these measures.

I cannot understand how anyone who is a friend of the soldier can vote for the Harrison bill, because when he votes for that bill he votes to cut down the amount due the soldiers in the sum of $1,100,000,000. He deprives the soldiers of receiving that amount of money at some time in the future. I am not in favor of reducing the amount of the certificates approximately 50 percent. I cannot understand what kind of argument or what kind of explanation a Member of Congress could give to a soldier constituent back home if he should vote for the Harrison bill, and the soldier should expect to have the certificate cashed at its face value, and should find that he had been deprived of one-half its face value. At least, I shall not look my soldier constituents in the face and try to make such an explanation. I shall not put myself in an attitude where it will become necessary.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, unless there are some questions, I shall not take any more time.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Oklahoma devote a moment's time to section 3 of the Patman bill, in reference to the method there suggested for contracting the issuance of currency provided for in connection with the bonus.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, we now have in circulation approximately five and a half billion dollars of all kinds of money. If the Patman bill should pass and be approved by the President, or should pass over his veto and become the law, we probably should put in circulation something like $2,000,000,000 of new money. The circulation would be increased to the extent of something like $2,000,000,000. If, as a result of placing $2,000,000,000 of new money in circulation, money should become too plentiful—personally, I should like to see that happen—and we could not use the new money, if it should come to be in the way of the people of the country, section 3 provides a plan for getting this money out of circulation; and the plan is for the Government to take the money out of circulation. It could be done by selling bonds.

The Government has plenty of bonds to sell. The Federal Reserve System has approximately two and a half billion dollars of bonds in the portfolios of the several Federal Reserve banks. So, under the terms of the Patman bill, and under the terms of the Federal Reserve Act, the Government, at any time it sees fit, can remove money from circulation exactly as it removed money from circulation in 1921.

Beginning on the 4th of March 1921 and for the next 18 months the Government took out of circulation over a hundred million dollars a month. At the end of 18 months the actual money in circulation, gold and silver and paper, had shrunk $1,800,000,000. As I understand, similar action is proposed by section 3 of this bill.

The bill proposes to take as the standard the price level of 1926—that is, the price level when the prices of all sorts of commodities were estimated on a basis of 100. In 1926 every class of business was more or less prosperous, and the price level of 1926 has been taken as the standard for the measurement of prosperity. Since 1926 prosperity has been going in one direction; before 1926 it was coming from another direction.

Taking the price level of 1926 as the standard, if money should become too plentiful, if prices should become too high above the 1926 price level, the remedy would be to take money out of circulation, to make money scarce, to make money high, and to bring prices down.

In 1920 we had high prices, we had plenty of money, and after 1921 a new administration came into power, and in an effort to reduce prices money was taken out of circulation, money was made scarce, money was made high, and prices were made low. The exact thing the administration wanted to do was done.

This bill provides a similar plan for the adjustment of the price level. I contend that the price level is still too low. It is too low in every State in the Union, and we will have no return of prosperity, in my judgment, until the price level is substantially raised, and just as fast as the price level is raised upon any given commodity, that commodity is out of the depression.

I made the statement a little while ago that in the West, hogs and cattle now have a price level which makes their production profitable. Today, with cattle at the present price, cattle can be raised and the cattle growers can make some money. Today hog producers can raise hogs, with hogs at the present price, and make some money. Today, for the cattlemen and for the hog men, the depression is practically over, and they are given opportunity to adjust their affairs and produce something.

A cattle raiser has no trouble today in borrowing money at the bank. A hog raiser has no trouble today in borrowing money at the bank. Banks are glad to make loans to those raising cattle; banks are glad to make loans to those raising hogs, because the banks know that when the cattle and the hogs are ready for the market the farmers can sell them and have a substantial profit left, and that profit will be paid back to the banks.

Does that explain the matter to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator. During the course of the Senator's explanation I noticed, by reference to the bill, that no provision whatever is made for retiring the notes which are to be issued under the provisions of the proposed legislation; that is, whatever contraction of currency there is is to be in Federal Reserve notes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I might say, in answering the question, that the author of the bill has a conviction that the amount of money that we must keep in circulation would be in excess of the amount we put in circulation through the payment to the veterans. We now have, and have had for some time, approximately five and a half billion dollars of money in circulation. It is thought by many that we must always have that much actual money in circulation. Some believe we ought to have more. I think we should temporarily have more. I am not sure about what may be necessary later on, when times get better and conditions improve. We might go back to a small amount of money in circulation when check money and credit money are vigorously active. But I think it is necessary to place more real money in circulation in order to thaw out the frozen deposits and frozen assets, notes, mortgages, bonds, and what not, held by the banks as security for their loans.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Would not section 3 authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to compel the Federal Reserve authorities to reduce their circulating notes regardless of the needs of business? In other words, there might be a difference of opinion between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve banks, in which event there would be in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury absolute control over the amount of circulating medium in the country.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is true today. That makes no change from a practical standpoint.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator does not approve it, does he?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I approve the theory of some Government official having control. As it has been in the past years, someone has controlled the matter, and we do not know who it is. I know of no one who can point his finger at the man today who controls the monetary situation in the United States, yet someone controls it. We have in circulation the amount of money that is in circulation because of someone's influence. Those controlling it are unknown, they are called " money changers ", they are called " international bankers ", but we cannot say actually who they are, perhaps. Some may know who they are.

I prefer to have a Federal board control the amount of money in circulation than to have an unknown board, or an unknown influence, or an unknown person control the volume of money in circulation for his own or his friends' private benefit, and that is what we have today and what we have had for years past.

I am for the administration banking bill, let me say to the Senator from Colorado, because it proposes to take control from that private influence, wherever it may be, and pass it into the hands of Federal officials, whom we know and with whom we might have some influence.

Mr. President, before I take my seat, I should like to say that I was shown a dispatch a moment ago stating that silver had fallen 5 cents today. I wonder how my friends in the Senate from the 8 or 10 silver States view the situation. A year ago we passed a solemn enactment through Congress commanding the Treasury to go out into the markets of the world and buy silver until one of two things happened—until either silver went to $1.29 an ounce or until we secured in the monetary stocks of the United States at least one-third of as much silver as we had gold, 25 percent in gold, 75 percent in silver. There was a solemn command by the Congress upon the Treasury Department to go into the open markets of the world and commence securing silver until one of those two things happened. Neither thing has come about. We have bought about 400,000,000 ounces of silver in a year's time.

When the price of silver began to go up some influence stopped the rise, and now the price is 70 cents. It has fallen 11 cents in the past week or 10 days. If silver had been permitted to go to $1.29 an ounce, one of the objectives of the Congress would have been fulfilled, and the Treasury could have stopped buying silver. Under the present policy we are not raising the price of silver to $1.29 an ounce, and we are not getting 25 percent of it in our monetary stock. Neither branch of the program is being carried out as far as I know.

Mr. President, the plan of securing silver, so far as I am advised, is rather peculiar. It is well known that the Federal Reserve bank in New York is against the silver program. It is well known that the big banks of New York and of the Northeast are against the silver program. When the Congress commanded the Treasury Department to go into the open market and buy silver, the Treasury Department took the power which Congress gave it and transferred that power to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and made the Federal Reserve Bank of New York its agent, the Treasury's agent, to buy the silver. It put the power to buy the silver into the hands of perhaps the greatest enemy of the silver program in the country.

Then the Federal Reserve bank, in turn, took the power the Treasury gave it to buy silver, and put that power into the hands of the banks comprising the Federal Reserve System in New York City, and here we have the situation of the Treasury, acting under a congressional decree to buy silver, in order to raise the price of silver, giving that power over to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

Mr. President, I may say that I have no interest in the production of silver; no silver is produced in my State; but the price of cotton follows the price of silver, the price of wheat, and the price of livestock follow the price of silver. When silver goes up, cotton goes up, wheat goes up, livestock goes up. When silver goes down, wheat goes down, cotton goes down, and livestock goes down.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I am just wondering whether those commodities have fallen because of the recent decline in the price of silver. Does the Senator know?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If I had time, I could show clippings from the financial journals which disclose that the price of cotton has gone down with the decline in the price of silver; that the price of wheat has fallen with the decline in silver. When silver was selling at 81 cents an ounce, wheat was selling at $1.02 a bushel. Last year wheat was selling for 95 or 96 cents a bushel. That explains the situation.

Mr. President, I am asked by a Senator sitting beside me what has caused the price of silver to fall. Silver could not have gone down had our Government been in the market buying silver. We are trying to get silver; we have tried for a year, and have bought only 400,000,000 ounces. We have to buy over a billion ounces of silver, and we have not bought it. Presumably we cannot get it. But silver has been selling in the markets of the world, and we have not been there to buy it. If we had been, silver would not have fallen in the world market. The United States is not in the silver market at the present time. That is the reason why silver has fallen.

Under the plan that is being followed by the Treasury of delegating power to buy silver to the greatest enemy of silver in the Nation, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and the Federal Reserve bank in turn delegating its power to other enemies, banks of New York, to buy silver, what have we?

The Federal Reserve Board of New York knows what the Government's policy is from day to day. The big banks which have been commissioned by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to buy silver for the Reserve bank know what the policy of the Government is from day to day. When the Government is buying, they buy. When the Government is in the market, they know the Government is in the market.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt my able friend, but he is on a theme which interests me, because I must confess considerable want of information—I may say ignorance—as to a phase of his discussion. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether he does not know from his experience that our Government buys gold directly?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Every time an ounce of gold is offered for sale in this country, our Government buys it for itself.

Mr. LEWIS. Why should not the silver-purchasing policy be the same system as that for purchasing gold?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It should be exactly so; but we are not doing so.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator from Oklahoma what the reason is for not doing so?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I cannot say. The fact is that we are not buying silver. Had we been buying silver, it would not have gone down 11 cents in the past 3 or 4 or 5 days.

Mr. President, there are only 10,000,000,000 ounces of silver in all the world. A little over a year ago silver was selling for 25 cents an ounce. We could have purchased every ounce of silver in the world at that time for two and a half billion dollars, and we had the money with which to do it. Considering the manner in which the Congress has been appropriating money, two and a half billion dollars is only pocket change. Less than 2 years ago we could have taken two and a half billion dollars and with it have bought all the silver in the world. However, I must modify that statement. We could not have bought all the silver in the world, because half the people in the world use silver, and they would have refused to sell. India would not have permitted her currency to come to America. India has 450,000,000 people. The people of India use their silver for coin. They do not use paper.

The people of India use silver, and they would not have sold their silver coin, so the United States could not have bought the Indian silver. Four and a half billion ounces of the world's supply of silver is located in India. We cannot buy it.

There are two and a half billion ounces of silver in China. The Chinese have the Chinese silver dollar. They must have those silver dollars. They are not used to using paper money; they use silver. They might sell us some little silver, but not very much; so we could not buy the Chinese silver.

Take the four and one-half billion ounces of silver in India, and add to that the two and one-half billion ounces of silver in China, and what do we have? We have 7,000,000,000 ounces of silver in two countries alone which we cannot secure. Then, the United States has 1,000,000,000 ounces of silver. That makes a total of 8,000,000,000 ounces; and there are only 10,000,000,000 ounces of silver in the whole world. There are only 2,000,000,000 ounces of silver in all the world outside of China, India, and the United States. The 50 other countries using silver have only 2,000,000,000 ounces of silver. In order to carry out our program we must get a billion ounces of that 2,000,000,000 ounces of silver. However, we cannot get it, of course. It would be impossible to get it without raising the price of silver to $2 or perhaps $3 an ounce.

When the speculators are selling silver on the foreign market it is patent and evident that the United States is not in the market, because if it were in the market silver would not have fallen as it has fallen in the past few days. But someone might ask, "What significance has the rise of the price of silver and the fall of the price of silver?" Let me show the Senate what the significance of that is.

As silver goes up in buying power, the silver-using countries—that is, countries using silver for money, such as Mexico, which has the peso, and Brazil, which has the milreis, and India, which has the rupee—as silver goes up, the values of other commodities go up as measured in terms of gold, which means as measured in terms of other commodities.

As I mentioned, some days ago the Mexican silver dollar increased in value 2½ cents, by reason of the American silver program. The buying power of the silver peso in Mexico went up 2½ cents. In the past 2 days silver has gone down, so the Mexican silver peso has fallen 2½ cents.

Is it a good thing for Mexico to have their money worth a cent more one day than it is worth the next day? The value of the money has gone up and down, and in the past few days it has gone down 2½ cents through no fault of theirs. Who is responsible for the fluctuation in the price of silver? The Americans are responsible, because they went into the market and started the price up.

Mr. President, that is not the worst of it. During the past week or 10 days in China the Chinese silver dollar has increased 12 cents in value. On March 30 the Chinese dollar was worth 48 cents. As silver went up the buying value of the Chinese dollar likewise went up; it increased 12 cents in that length of time. When silver goes down again, measured in terms of gold, the Chinese silver dollar falls, and we are responsible for it.

If we have a policy, that policy should be known. It should be regular. It should not be permitted to fluctuate up and down, because to that extent it interferes with and destroys and ruins the currencies of the world.

The United States has the power to control the price of gold. We are controlling the price of gold. When we fixed the value of gold at $35 an ounce, and stepped out in the open market of the world to buy gold at $35 an ounce, from that moment to this gold has been worth $35 per ounce.

When we started to raise the price of silver the world price soon reached the price we fixed. We have the power today to fix the value of gold throughout the world. Does anyone doubt that?

There are only $20,000,000,000 of gold in all the world. All the 50 nations of the world together, civilized and uncivilized, have only $20,000,000,000 worth of gold. Of that amount the United States has eight and one-half billion dollars. France has over $5,000,000,000. The United States and France together have fourteen-twentieths of all the monetary gold in the world. That is seven-tenths for the two nations. We, the United States, have almost half of it.

The United States today has the power to fix the price of gold at any point America sees proper, and maintain that price by buying and selling gold. The United States today has the power to buy every ounce of silver in the world if it can get possession of it. However, we cannot get possession of it. There is not a billion ounces that we can get. We can put the price of that billion ounces at any point we desire, and the price of that billion ounces will control the price of all the other silver in the world.

To return to the question of stabilization for just a moment, when we have stabilization of money in America it will be at a time when the United States takes a notion to stabilize its own currency; and when we stabilize our own currency at such a buying value as best to serve our own domestic economy we must keep our taxes in view, and our interest in view, and our mass debts in view, because they will control the value of our money.

When we decide to stabilize our currency we perhaps shall have no assistance from other nations, but today we have the power to fix the value of the dollar in terms of gold just where we want to fix it. We can fix the value of the dollar in terms of silver just where we want to fix it.

If we proceed to regulate our money at the point where we want it to serve our own domestic economy, we can fix that policy, and through our policy of buying gold and our policy of buying and selling silver we can maintain the price of gold at any point we see fit, and we can maintain the price of silver at any point we see fit.

It is a simple matter, as I see it, to fix the ratio between silver and gold; but before we can fix that ratio we must get silver up to where the ratio is recognized. We cannot have a ratio between gold and silver when gold is worth $35 an ounce and silver is worth 70 cents an ounce. That ratio is too much at variance. Any time this Government desires to stabilize its currency we can stabilize our currency to suit ourselves; and when we stabilize our currency we stabilize the price of gold and we stabilize the price of silver throughout the world.

If Congress would do what I think it should do, it would carry out the mandate of the Constitution, regulate the value of the dollar to suit our own domestic economy, fix its value in terms of gold and fix its value in terms of silver, and say that 1 ounce of gold is worth so many ounces of silver, and so many ounces of silver are worth 1 ounce of gold—possibly in the relation of 16 ounces of silver to 1 of gold.

We can say that 1 ounce of gold is worth 16 ounces of silver, 1 to 16. That is the 16-to-1 ratio. We can fix that by law. Then, with the gold we have, and the power we have to secure silver, we can maintain that ratio by selling silver and buying gold, and buying silver and selling gold. When we get stabilization, we can maintain it in that way. We now have the power to fix it, and we can do it at any time we see fit. As I see it, that is the most important thing now before the country.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to speak for only a few moments.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. LONG. I will surrender the floor to the Senator from West Virginia.

PREVENTION OF LYNCHING

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon I vainly endeavored to prevail upon the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who had been in possession of the floor for the greater part of 2 days, to yield me a few minutes in which to speak in opposition to the parliamentary lynching of the Costigan-Wagner antilynching bill. But the Senator held the floor until he finally yielded it for the express purpose of permitting the submission of a motion to adjourn. That motion prevailed. Thus, circumstances beyond my control have made it impossible for me to discuss the antilynching bill at an earlier hour.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. With the parliamentary situation which has existed for a week, I think the Senator from West Virginia will agree it was impossible for any Senator who desired to speak for the bill to occupy any time on the floor himself without participating in the filibuster. I can understand the embarrassment of the Senator from West Virginia, who desired to speak in favor of the bill, in not occupying time on the floor on yesterday.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has with his characteristic accuracy correctly stated the case. But the Senator from West Virginia is not embarrassed now. The filibusters have subsided, and the debate is without restriction.

During the last 8 days everything in the universe excepting the United States Senate has been in constant, persistent progression. The infinity of buds, which a week ago adorned the countless trees and shrubs on the spacious grounds around the Capitol, have burst into beautiful leaves or gorgeous flowers. The waters of the historic river on whose banks we loiter or labor have passed on to the bay, and from the bay to the vast and restless ocean beyond. The earth has, as usual, traveled on its tireless, ceaseless journey around the sun at the prodigious speed of 68,000 miles per hour. It has also continued to turn upon its axis at the incomprehensible rate of 19 miles a second. During these last 8 days, how far has the United States Senate traveled, what service has it rendered the Nation, what blessings has it bestowed upon the American people?

Let these questions be answered by those who are responsible for the willful waste of the last 8 days which have passed away forever.

Comfort may be found in the fact that in the course of the filibuster it appeared that during the last 19 centuries civilization has at least slightly advanced. Nineteen centuries ago the best and wisest man who ever preached the holy gospel of social justice on this planet was crucified as a reward for his efforts to humanize and Christianize the world. But one of the ablest and most uncompromising of those who have prevented the Senate from even considering the antilynching bill has made it perfectly clear that he would not crucify or even lynch the Reverend Mr. Coughlin, who millions believe is now preaching a gospel similar to that proclaimed by the Man of Galilee. The eminent Senator in question contented himself by declaring that he would only "snatch the halo from" Father Coughlin's "brow and throw it into" what was euphemistically designated as "the nearest spittoon", and "then throw the spittoon into the gutter."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator remember that Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, the pastor of the John D. Rockefeller Baptist Church, delivered a number of political sermons of which there never was any criticism? I wondered why any Senator should find it so terrible to have the gospel preached according to Christ and not complain of the preaching of the gospel according to the Standard Oil Co., which went abroad throughout this land for so many years.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, instead of attempting to answer the Senator from Louisiana, let me express the opinion that if the sinless Savior were to return to earth in the flesh today and repeat the righteous gospel which He preached along the shores of Galilee nineteen hundred years ago, He would be denounced as a demagogue and a revolutionist and would, in all probability, again be put to death.

Mr. LONG. Would the Senator let me read him something?

Mr. NEELY. Gladly.

Mr. LONG. Here is a passage from the Bible which cannot be read in a pulpit. I defy the minister of any Protestant church—and I am a Protestant, as my father and mother were Protestants, and my grandfather and grandmother were Protestants, and their grandfather was a preacher—I defy any minister to read it from his pulpit.

Mr. NEELY. Let me invite the Senator from Louisiana to read it in my time, and let us hope that it may have a spiritualizing influence on all who are present.

Mr. LONG. I should like to have the Senator from North Carolina get any Christian minister to read in the pulpit the passage I am about to read. I read from the fifth chapter of the Book of James:

Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you.

Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are motheaten.

Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days.

Behold, the hire of the labourers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth: and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth.

Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have nourished your hearts, as in a day of slaughter.

Such passages from the gospel are not read from the pulpit any more by ministers of the gospel. If a priest, a Baptist, or anybody else dares to utter them over the radio, there is nothing but crucifixion left for him.

Mr. NEELY. It is unfortunate that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana was not here with his Bible yesterday afternoon. If he could have obtained the floor, he might have read the Scripture with good effect to those who were making it impossible for the Senate to vote for a bill which provides ways and means of scourging every loathsome lyncher and infamous mob murderer from this Nation's temple of civilization.

Mr. President, as the result of the prolonged filibuster against the antilynching measure, the Senate has for more than a week utterly neglected the veterans' compensation legislation; the social security bill, including old-age pensions; the 30-hour-week bill for industrial workers; the Guffey coal bill, designed to stabilize the coal industry and save it from chaos; the extension of the National Recovery Act; and other highly important matters too numerous to mention. Let no one lay to his soul the flattering unction that the country has approved of his action in filibustering against the antilynching bill.

The press of the East and the West, the North and the South has almost unanimously condemned the Senate filibuster which ended yesterday afternoon.

And let me observe in passing that I am speaking as a southerner. The State which I have a part of the honor of representing in this body lies south of the Mason and Dixon line. It is a part of the happy land that a West Virginia poet had in mind when he said:

O, Southland fair and fine;
Where the air is tanged like wine,
And the slumbrous days are lethed in a languor half divine;
Where the cypress rears its head o'er the swamp plants' oozy bed,
And the water lily rustles to the muskrat's stealthy tread.

Let me read from a recent number of the Huntington Advertiser, which is one of the leading Democratic newspapers of West Virginia. Referring to one of the Senators who participated in the filibuster, this paper says:

His outburst is typical of the general assault being made upon the measure by southern Members of Congress. They seem to interpret it as particularly designed to insult and reflect upon their section. It is unfortunate that they should assume this attitude.

Lynching long since has become a national evil and reproach. And because it has ceased to be sectional we find practically all the States in the Union with statutes of some kind intended to safeguard against known or suspect perpetrators of revolting crimes becoming the victims of mob passions. Sometimes these laws are not enforced, in the North as well as in the South, because officers are influenced by local sentiment.

Some of the worst examples of mob violence in recent years have been provided in States without the South. There was the barbarous lynching of two men in California a year or so ago after they had confessed to the murder of a boy in connection with a kidnaping. Illinois, Ohio, Michigan, and New England States have been the scenes of lynchings during the past decade and a half. In virtually every case the victim was a white man.

Since lynching no longer is confined to any one section, it is a reproach to our whole American civilization, and therefore should be subject to Federal legislation to be enforced without fear or favor and regardless of local sentiment. That is the purpose of the Wagner-Costigan bill, to rid the Nation of a barbarous custom, not to insult a section and interfere with local self-government. On that score it deserves to pass.

I now read from a leading newspaper of one of the greatest and most Democratic of Southern States—old Virginia.

Mr. LONG. Virginia went for Hoover. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEELY. Thrice and four times happy the State which has made but one political error and has subsequently fully atoned for that. I now read from the Richmond Times-Dispatch of Tuesday, April 30:

UNEDIFYING SPECTACLE

While this newspaper is without enthusiasm for the Costigan-Wagner antilynching bill, it takes this opportunity of deploring the methods being used by certain southern Senators to defeat that legislation.

It is interesting to recall in this connection that there are representative southerners who favor the bill. The Interracial Commission, composed of 50 members from 11 Southern States, unanimously approved the measure at its annual meeting in Atlanta last week.

While we have no particularly strong feeling either for or against this piece of proposed legislation, we feel that such a filibuster as its opponents are organizing is a travesty on the parliamentary process. Imagine a supposed group of statesmen having to sit up for hours, days, and possibly weeks, while southern Senators read books of the Bible, lengthy documents having to do with the most approved mode of exterminating the earwig, and the latest technique for growing horse radishes.

We are aware that filibusters have been resorted to over a long period of time, and that the Senate has been reluctant to limit them, because of a feeling on its part that this might constitute a limitation on freedom of debate. At the opening of the current session, if memory serves, Senator GLASS introduced a resolution which would have compelled all Senators to speak to the question at issue, but this paper has not been heard of since. Apparently most of the Members of the upper branch of our national legislature are reluctant to adopt any such resolution for fear that some day they may wish to filibuster some projected statute to death.

So the Senators resort to such methods whenever they are sufficiently aroused over a pending bill. In the present instance a southern bloc appears to be highly excited over the proposed mode of combatting lynching. The red herring of State rights has been dragged forth and dusted off, intersectional animosities are being aroused, and obfuscations of various kinds are being resorted to.

Although we are inclined to wonder whether it would be wise to enact the Costigan-Wagner bill, our attitude proceeds primarily from doubts as to whether the proposed approach would be effective, and whether the bill's enactment might not serve greatly to intensify interracial animosities in the South. Certainly we are convinced that the bill ought to stand or fall on its merits, rather than on whether a group of diehards can stand the physical strain of reading chapters from the Bible until the proponents of the measure surrender.

Those proponents claim they have 52 certain votes in the Senate, with various other Members in doubt. If that claim is justified, the Costigan-Wagner bill should pass the Senate. If parliamentary government means anything, if the Democratic process has any validity, such a conclusion is inescapable.

The following editorial appears in today's Washington News, the most progressive daily paper published in the Capital city:

SO THIS IS DEMOCRACY

A large majority in Congress wants to enact a Federal antilynching law. A large majority of the citizens of the country favor such a law. This has been so for many years. Then why isn't there a law? Since this is a democracy in which Congress is elected by popular majorities and in which Congress itself acts by majority rule, how could the Senate yesterday throw the antilynching bill and prevent majority rule?

Well, it seems that ours is a democracy in textbooks and Fourth of July orations, but not in the Senate. There, periodically, it is possible to rule by minority dictatorship. The method is not the one of stuffing the ballot box, or of kidnaping or terrorizing the majority, so that the minority can palm itself off as the majority. The method is much simpler. The minority merely decrees that there shall be no vote at all. This is achieved under the rule of unlimited debate by which the minority talks a measure to death. It forces the majority to turn to other emergency legislation acceptable to the minority dictators.

While congratulating the southern Senators on the effectiveness of their dictatorship, we venture to raise this question for their consideration: Is it wise, from their point of view, to kick democracy in the face quite so publicly at this particular time?

Granting that they have got away with it for many years, hasn't there been a recent change in the public temper which makes this sort of thing somewhat dangerous? Wouldn't it have been wiser from their point of view, for instance, to give the Negro lynch victim the nominal protection of Federal law and then nullified the law as they nullify the Negro's constitutional right to vote?

We are interested in this question because we understand that these southern Senators are very fearful of the spread of radicalism, especially among Negroes. The radicals are said to be telling the Negroes and the poor white share-croppers and mill hands of the South that democracy is a fake, that there is no such thing as representative government in this country, that democracy is only camouflage for dictatorship by their enemies. Aren't those radical agitators just mean enough to prove this point in the minds of ignorant Negroes and whites by citing the dictatorship of those few southern Senators thwarting the mass democratic will of the American people and of the majority of Congress?

Admitting, from the point of view of these southern Senators, that Negroes must continue to be robbed of constitutional rights, couldn't they find a safer method? After all, the Negroes are one-tenth of the national population and in many places they are a majority. With all this talk of radicalism and some of the oppressed actually demanding their rights, perhaps it would be safer for the country to hold out enough hope of democracy to them to discourage more violent weapons.

Anyway, it may be a matter worth thinking about while these southern Senators are patting themselves on the back, secure in their dictatorship—secure for the moment.

Mr. President, this filibuster was conducted on two alleged grounds, first, on that of State rights. It was urged that the enactment of the bill would violate these rights which are so very dear to so very many Democratic hearts, This contention is but the repetition of one that has been persistently made, times without number, during the last hundred and twenty-five years. But there is more than the State rights article of faith in the Democratic creed. Another is to the effect that the majority shall rule. Any other theory is un-Democratic and unsound because as Mr. Bryan once said, "One who opposes majority rule must favor minority rule", and a minority might dwindle until eventually there would be but one person on one side of a question and all the rest might be on the other side. It would obviously be preposterous to admit that one person had more wisdom or more virtue than all the rest of the people combined.

It is generally understood that a majority of the Members of the Senate have favored the enactment of the antilynching bill. If those who have, for more than a week, so vigorously preached the democratic doctrine of State rights had only practiced a little of the democratic principle of gracefully submitting to the will of the majority, the antilynching bill would have long since received senatorial approval.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NEELY. I yield to the eloquent Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I want to ask the Senator from West Virginia, conscious of his past experience in this body and in the House to justify my allusion, if he will not recall that there has been exercised by the Federal Government, under a change in policy, a jurisdiction of the Federal courts to take cognizance of the offense within the States called kidnapping, therefore taking such jurisdiction in conjunction with the States and giving the Federal courts sufficient jurisdiction to punish completely for the wrong and the outrage. Would not such a measure be wholly legal in the Senator's opinion, and would it not be wholly legal for us to give the same jurisdiction in the matter of lynching within the State to the Federal court in a direct process as we do now with reference to kidnaping, and thus avoid all these other matters of mere dollars and cents judgments against counties?

Mr. NEELY. If the Senator from West Virginia had entertained the slightest doubt concerning the power of the Congress to enact valid antilynching legislation, he, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, would not have voted for a favorable report on the Costigan-Wagner bill which is now on the calendar.

Mr. President, the other ground upon which the filibustering battle has raged is that of unconstitutionality. Dr. Johnson once said:

Hell is paved with good intentions.

If he were alive today, he might, with equal propriety say that hell is paved with endless, fallacious, fantastic arguments against the constitutionality of every great reform measure that has been before the Congress of the United States during the last hundred years.

Every time that an effort is made to legislate for the underprivileged, the friendless, or the oppressed, some hair-splitting metaphysician, who does not know that the law was made for man, and not man for the law, promptly comes forward to declare that reform legislation is unconditionally unconstitutional.

Can it possibly be unconstitutional for this Government to protect its citizens—its taxpayers—against mob murderers in cases in which the States refuse or fail to discharge their duty in this important matter? How can anyone with a scintilla of national pride or self-respect seriously contend that the Constitution requires the Federal Government to stand idly by while nearly a hundred of its citizens are every year tortured to death by means more horrifying than any of which the fiercest Indian tribe ever dared to dream; and what is this crime which the States have failed to prevent and which we are now making a belated effort to eradicate by Federal law? The report of the committee on this bill describes it better than any words in my vocabulary can explain it. I now read so much of the report of the lynching of Claude Neal as can be read without offending the ears of the gentlewomen and gentlemen with whom the galleries are filled. This unspeakable horror occurred in a Southern State, which, in compliance with a Senate rule, will not be named. In this case the victim of the mob was charged with the murder of a white girl. The accused was taken from the officers of the law. Some of the outrages perpetrated upon the victim are too horrifying for repetition.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NEELY. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Colorado.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask my friend, the able Senator from West Virginia, whether prior to the incidents he has narrated there was a court trial establishing the guilt or innocence of the accused?

Mr. NEELY. There was no trial. The accused did not enjoy even the shadow of an opportunity to have his guilt or innocence determined according to law. Here is what a bystander told the investigator who was sent by the Association for the Advancement of Colored People to the scene of the lynching to obtain the facts in the case. As many of you doubtless know the association in question numbers among its members such distinguished persons as the present Governor of the State of New York; the Honorable William Allen White, of Kansas; the able senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], and many others whose names are household words throughout the land.

I now read from the report but necessarily slightly digress from the letter of the text to avoid giving offense either to the Senate or the audience in the galleries.

After taking the nigger to the woods about 4 miles from Greenwood—

They cut off certain parts of his body and then compelled him to eat them, and made him say that he liked it.

Then they sliced his sides and stomach with knives, and every now and then somebody would cut off a finger or toe. Red-hot irons were used on the nigger to burn him from top to bottom. From time to time during the torture a rope would be tied around Neal's neck and he was pulled up over a limb and held there until he almost choked to death, when he would be let down and the torture begin all over again. After several hours of this unspeakable torture "they decided just to kill him."

Neal's body was tied to a rope on the rear of an automobile and dragged over the highway to the Cannidy home. Here a mob estimated to number somewhere between 3,000 and 7,000 people from 11 Southern States was excitedly waiting his arrival. When the car which was dragging Neal's body came in front of the Cannidy home, a man who was riding the rear bumper cut the rope.

"A woman came out of the Cannidy house and drove a butcher knife into his heart. Then the crowd came by and some kicked him and some drove their cars over him."

Men, women, and children were numbered in the vast throng that came to witness the lynching. It is reported from reliable sources that the little children, some of them mere tots, who lived in the Greenwood neighborhood, waited with sharpened sticks for the return of Neal's body, and that when it rolled in the dust on the road that awful night these little children drove their weapons deep into the flesh of the dead man.

The body, which by this time was horribly mutilated, was taken by the mob to Marianna, a distance of 10 or 11 miles, where it was hung to a tree on the northeast corner of the courthouse square. Pictures were taken of the mutilated form and hundreds of photographs were sold for 50 cents each. Scores of citizens viewed the body as it hung in the square. The body was perfectly nude until the early morning when someone had the decency to hang a burlap sack over the middle of the body. The body was cut down about 8:30 Saturday morning, October 27, 1934.

Fingers and toes from Neal's body have been exhibited as souvenirs in Marianna where one man offered to divide the finger which he had with a friend as "a special favor." Another man has one of the fingers preserved in alcohol.

Mr. President, no one, however eminent he may be in the profession of the law; no Senator, regardless of his wisdom, his eloquence, or the sincerity of his purpose, can ever convince me that there is anything in the Constitution of the United States which says that the Congress cannot pass a law to drive this devastating, horrifying, infamous monster known as "lynching" or "mob murder" from this land. If there is a single phrase, or sentence, or syllable, in the Constitution to the effect that the United States cannot protect its humblest citizen, of whatever color or creed, against blood-curdling barbarities, such as were inflicted for more than 10 hours upon the agonized body of Claude Neal, such phrase, or sentence, or syllable, is a disgrace to the great charter of American liberty and should by appropriate means be forever stricken from that immortal document.

Some of the greatest legal authorities in the land have declared that they believe the Costigan-Wagner bill is constitutional. The Senate Committee on the Judiciary has unanimously decided that it is constitutional.

Let me remind my Democratic friends that the great Woodrow Wilson, in denouncing never-ending efforts to have all humanitarian legislation declared unconstitutional, once said:

The Constitution of the United States is a vehicle of life, not a skeleton of fear.

In terrifying this body into silence on this subject with your specious argumentation you have, in defiance of Woodrow Wilson—one of the greatest men who has walked this earth since the morning stars sang together—made the Constitution of the United States a skeleton of fear.

Senators, when this measure again comes before this body, as it is almost certain to do, let us not make the Nation a laughing-stock by making the Constitution a skeleton of fear. Let us make that sacred instrumentality a vehicle of life which one of our greatest Democratic Presidents declared it to be, let us as Senators see to it that under that living instrument—which I pray God may never die—the people of this Nation, regardless of color or condition, enjoy absolute security of life and liberty and law until the end of time.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3896) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, for controlled expansion of the currency, and to extend the time for filing applications for benefits under the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, and for other purposes.

MAKE GOOD ON THE PROMISE TO THE SOLDIERS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, returning to the bonus fight, I wish to counsel with my friends in the Senate in the open as to the best method by which we can get a bonus bill that will mean the payment of a respectable sum of money to the soldiers and do some good for the country.

Some moments ago I addressed a question to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] as to whether or not our best strategy might not be to offer the Vinson bill as a substitute for the Harrison bill, so that we might have then a vote straight out on the Patman bill as against the Vinson bill.

The Senator from Oklahoma and myself at that time were apparently in agreement that the best thing we could do would be to adopt the Vinson bill as an amendment to the Harrison amendment, and then try to adopt the Patman bill as a substitute for the amendment known as the "Vinson bill."

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. If the Senator from Louisiana is about to address the Senate on this very important measure, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I dislike to have a quorum called, since it is rather late in the evening; but if the Senator desires to have a quorum present, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FRAZIER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	King	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Copeland	La Follette	Robinson
Austin	Costigan	Lewis	Russell
Bachman	Couzens	Logan	Schall
Bailey	Dickinson	Lonergan	Schwellenbach
Bankhead	Dieterich	Long	Sheppard
Barbour	Donahey	McAdoo	Shipstead
Barkley	Duffy	McCarran	Smith
Bilbo	Fletcher	McGill	Steiwer
Black	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bone	Gerry	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Borah	Gibson	Metcalf	Townsend
Brown	Glass	Minton	Trammell
Bulkley	Gore	Moore	Truman
Bulow	Guffey	Murphy	Tydings
Burke	Hale	Murray	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Harrison	Neely	Van Nuys
Capper	Hastings	Nye	Wagner
Caraway	Hatch	O'Mahoney	Walsh
Carey	Hayden	Overton	Wheeler
Clark	Johnson	Pittman	White
Connally	Keyes	Pope

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have earlier announced the absence of certain Senators, and I now repeat my announcement, and ask that it stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have risen for the purpose of trying to strike a note of harmony among those of us who want to pass a bonus bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the Senator know that the bonus bill is now before the Senate?

Mr. LONG. Which bonus bill?

Mr. BLACK. The adjusted-service-certificate bill.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator mean the Harrison amendment?

Mr. BLACK. I mean that the measure before the Senate is the bonus bill. The Senator is going to discuss that, is he? He is not going to engage in any filibuster?

Mr. LONG. No; I am going to discuss the bonus bill. I have never filibustered in my life. [Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. President, we are up against two old-line forces here, and I hope we will not be caught between them. My good old-line Republican standpatter friends on the other side do not want any bonus bill, I am afraid; that is, those who call themselves standpatters. That does not include all of them who might be standpatters. The reactionary Democrats do not want any bonus bill, either. So now we are up against the proposition here of trying to get a bonus bill through.

I do not regard either the Harrison amendment or the Vinson bill as being a bill to pay the bonus. The question is as to what we ought to do. Should we pass the Vinson bill as against the Harrison amendment and then trust to beating the Vinson amendment with the Patman bill, or should we vote down the Vinson bill with a feeling of assurance that our chances are better to pass the Patman bill against the Harrison amendment than to pass it against the Vinson bill?

As I understand it, there are a good many Senators on the Republican side, and some on the Democratic side, who feel that they would have to vote for the Patman bill as against the Harrison amendment, but who might feel that they would not have to vote for the Patman bill against the Vinson bill. I do not know just why that is.

I understand the Vinson bill would somewhat mollify their situation, ease their consciences, of course, whereas that result would not follow if the Harrison amendment were left to a vote as against the Patman bill. I am wondering whether or not we should not begin to discuss strategy.

Mr. President, the move that has been taken is a very peculiar one. The Patman bill passed the House of Representatives. The House, after considerable study, went on record for the Patman bill. Under that bill the soldiers would be paid the bonus, and it would be of other benefit besides that. It would put a little money into circulation, which the country sadly needs. If the Patman bill were enacted, it would turn loose in the United States $2,100,000,000, which, without any interest charges against the Government, or any bonds, without any bonds whatever, without any bankers' discount, without any kind of delay, would all go directly into the pockets of the soldiers who fought the war of 1917–18.

Mr. President, of all the jujitsu objects that have been bounced about on the party feet of Democratic and Republican politicians, the soldier has been the one who has received the worst treatment. I have seen a Japanese artist take a barrel and toss it in 14 different directions. I have seen him take his hands and throw the barrel onto his feet and then take his feet and throw the barrel back to his hands. I have seen those artists balance a barrel in various and sundry positions, at one angle at one time and at another angle at another time, but I have never seen as many wriggling performances done by any Japanese jujitsu artist with a barrel or other object that he was handed to bounce about as have characterized the efforts to keep from paying the soldier a bonus, while Congress tried to make the soldier believe they were giving him something.

We never have been able to get from Congress anything for the ex-service men unless it was accompanied by something in the nature of a bounty to the bankers; it has never yet been possible to get a real soldiers' bonus bill out of the United States Congress since that question has been before it. Unless it was sweetened up and made into some kind of a bounty for the bankers of this country no kind of a soldiers' bonus was possible that would meet the approval of the President or secure sufficient votes in Congress to override a veto by the President.

The talk which has gone abroad is that the Patman bill has only one fault, which is that it might be vetoed by the President. Let Senators be told something from someone who knows something. [Laughter.] The President is not going to veto the Patman bill. Did I not tell the Senate here last year that he would not veto the Frazier-Lemke bill? When we were trying to put through that bill proposed by the Senator from North Dakota, and when the only objection urged at the eleventh hour was that it would be vetoed by the President of the United States, I said then that the President would not veto the Frazier-Lemke bill, and he did not. How did I know that? Not from any word that came to me from the President. He seldom sends me any word. [Laughter.] But I knew it, because I know the President is a good politician.

I am a politician and a candidate for reelection. I would not veto the bonus. The President is a politician and is a candidate for reelection. He will not veto the bonus. I ask Senators to put that down. I know what I am talking about. There is not any chance on earth of the President vetoing the bonus.

There is not any difference in politicians except which politician stays in and which one gets out. They are all doing what they think they had better do. That is axiom no. 1. That is the first axiom of the conscience of a politician—what he had better do comes first. That is the first axiom of a politician. That is the first thing on his conscience. I do not mean that is any ulterior motive. I mean that is a superior motive. What the politician had better do to stay a politician, that is law no. 1 with him—the law of self-preservation.

There is no more chance of the President vetoing the bonus bill, if the Senate shall pass the Patman bill, than there is of my voting against it—none whatever.

I introduced this same bill here last year. I thought it was a good bill then. In fact, I knew it was a good bill.

If Senators wish to do any good for the country, the best thing they can do, instead of having $4,800,000,000 wasted—and I will guarantee that at least 75 percent of it will be wasted from the way the last $3,000,000,000 was spent, as I saw it—the best thing Senators can do would be to take $2,100,000,000 of that money and pay it out on this Patman bill. It will do more good and less harm, cause less scandal, and result in greater stimulation of business to put out that $2,100,000,000 than it will to spend $4,800,000,000, for which the Government is going to issue bonds, without increasing the currency circulation.

If we had a circulating currency of seven and one-half billion dollars in America today instead of five and one-half billion dollars which we now have, I know that that circulation of 30 percent more money or 40 percent more money would do more good than the issuance of $4,800,000,000 more of bonds, which would place the payment of the interest on that much more money onto the backs of the people, and give them no more money with which to pay the interest than they had before that great amount of bonds was issued.

That is one of the main reasons why the Patman bill should be passed. From that standpoint alone it will do more good than all the laws issued in this session of the Congress—and I mean all of them—and also all the laws enacted in the last session of the Congress, including the blessed Blue Eagle and other laws of similar kind and character.

Mr. President, unfortunately we have a very queer situation. On a real issue of consequence we never have been able to divorce the leadership of the Democratic and the Republican Parties in the Senate. Remember what I am saying. I am not trying to give any offense to anyone, or talking about any one man. I am talking about the general vote of the Democrats on this side and the general vote of Republicans on the other side of the Chamber, who, when it comes down to a genuine issue, somehow or other are together. We never are able to divorce them. They are going to find themselves together now on this question. We shall have to adopt a little strategy so they cannot get together, at least so they will not dare to allow people to see them together. We shall have to make it so they cannot get under the same tent. They do not want to be seen together. The last thing they want is to have it known that they are really running together, and we must do something to bring about a situation so they cannot afford to get together.

Therefore, it seems to me we must force the hands of the standpatters over on the Republican side who would like to beat the Democrats next fall, and fix them up to the point where they cannot stand with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and fix the Senator from Mississippi up to the point where he cannot afford to stand with them. Therefore, the strategy which I am recommending seems to be at variance with what I thought would be the best policy. Advocates of the Patman bill seem to think we had better vote down the Vinson bill. The House advocates think so. I am informed that the author of this bill over in the House, the Congressman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], believes we had best vote down the Vinson bill and take chances on voting the Harrison amendment down as against the Patman bill. That is the strategy we have to figure out. I believe we can work around here and get enough votes to pass this Patman bill if on this vote we can keep anyone from hiding behind the brush heaps.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is going to stay here with us this time, is he not? He is not going to play golf?

Mr. LONG. I have not played golf for a long time.

Mr. BLACK. I have not seen the Senator here for the last 3 days.

Mr. LONG. The Senator has not seen me here? The trouble with the Senator from Alabama, Mr. President, is that he does not want to come in and hear anything which will be helpful.

Mr. BLACK. I have been here all the time, Mr. President.

Mr. LONG. The trouble with the Senator from Alabama is that he does not listen to my advice nearly as much as he ought to. Many times he is up here making as though he wants me to tell him what to do, and then when I go to the trouble of figuring out to tell him what to do, half the time he does not do it, and I am not going to spend my time any more doing so.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Half the time it is impossible to tell which side the Senator is on. I have called his attention to that a number of times. Therefore, half the time it is impossible to know which way to go for those who desire to follow him.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will tell the Senator, any time he asks me, whether to vote yes or no. All in the world he has to do is to ask me, and I will tell him.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator whether he desired to vote for or against the motion to adjourn in connection with the bill which was up for several days.

Mr. LONG. What bill is the Senator talking about?

Mr. BLACK. Has the Senator been away all the time?

Mr. LONG. No, no; I have been around here, and between here and Iowa, for the past week. I have also been in Louisiana part of the time.

Mr. BLACK. We had a motion to adjourn and also a motion to recess, and I could not find out which side the Senator from Louisiana was on.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator from Alabama was making a speech I should have voted either to recess or to adjourn, whichever motion was up. It would not have made a bit of difference with me; I should have voted either to adjourn or to recess if the Senator was making a speech.

Mr. BLACK. I was not making a speech at that time.

Mr. LONG. Then I would have been willing to stay here.

Mr. BLACK. Would the Senator have been willing to vote in favor of adjournment?

Mr. LONG. That would depend on what was going on. If the Senator from Alabama was speaking——

Mr. BLACK. I was not speaking. I am stating that fact to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. The Senator was not speaking?

Mr. BLACK. No. Now, I want to know how the Senator would have voted on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LONG. I should like to know what was the matter with the Senator, in view of the fact that he was not speaking.

Mr. BLACK. I should like to know how the Senator from Louisiana would have voted on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator from Alabama was here listening to some one other than himself speak there was something wrong with the Senator, because I have never seen the Senator from Alabama stay here unless he himself was either fixing to speak or actually speaking.

Let me go a little further.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator from Louisiana says he has not seen me here except when I was fixing to speak or when I was speaking. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to the fact that he evidently thinks I follow him all the time, because he has spoken all the time he was here when he could get the floor.

Mr. LONG. That is the trouble, Mr. President. If the Senator had listened to me as much as he ought to, he would have voted right all along the line. I could tell him a number of things as to how he ought to vote. I can tell him how he ought to vote on this bill.

Mr. BLACK. On which side is the Senator from Louisiana? I have been listening to him, and I cannot tell on which side he is.

Mr. LONG. I have been trying to say on which side I am.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator waits so long before he tells that I am unable to say on which side he is.

Mr. LONG. I am calling the Senator from Alabama in to consult with me in order that we may fully decide where to go.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is going to call me into a conference?

Mr. LONG. I am going to call the Senator into the organization in order to make up our minds what to do. Is the Senator from Alabama for the bonus?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Which one?

Mr. BLACK. The one that will be the best and give the veteran the most money out of what is due him.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator vote for the Patman bill?

Mr. BLACK. I will vote for the bill which has the most strength in the Senate.

Mr. LONG. Oh, the Senator is going to vote with the biggest vote? Then we shall have to wait for the roll call to find out how the Senator from Alabama will vote.

Mr. BLACK. No; I voted in the committee for the Vinson bill.

Mr. LONG. I see.

Mr. BLACK. I was sure it was stronger than the other. The Senator says he is going to have a conference. He says "we." I am trying to find out whom he includes in "we."

Mr. LONG. I am talking about all the Senators now, 95 of them. I am talking about all the Senators who are here.

Mr. BLACK. Then the Senator has accepted the leadership for both sides? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Absolutely, at this time.

Mr. BLACK. At this time?

Mr. LONG. Yes. There is no question but that both sides need a leader right now. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. I am sure the Senator's leadership is needed by the other side, and I am certain he has been working with them continuously for the past few months.

Mr. LONG. Of course, I do not want it to get back to Alabama that the Senator from Alabama is following me, Mr. President.

Mr. BLACK. I should not want it either, Mr. President, because I am not following the Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. It was on behalf of the Senator from Alabama that I was making that point.

Now the Senator from Alabama says he will vote for the Vinson bill. What is in the Vinson bill? He says he will vote for it because it had the most votes in the committee. The Vinson bill does not appropriate a dollar with which to pay a bonus. As the Senator from Oklahoma said, we might as well have a resolution from the association of commerce that they were in favor of paying the bonus as to pass the Vinson bill. It does not pay the soldier a dime more than if we made nothing more than an empty gesture. That is the authority I have from the Senator from Oklahoma, which I did not hear disputed by the Senator from Alabama, if he was in the Senate Chamber. I doubt whether he was; but I am stating it under the impression, as I say, that the Senator was not here to hear the Senator from Oklahoma when he was speaking. The Senator is seldom here for anything of that kind, and yet he takes me to task if I happen to go and take a little rest when I have had a cold or a temperature of 102 degrees, and I go out to Iowa to make a speech.

Mr. President, we have to put the matter where the Senator from Alabama and his kind will be smoked out away from the Vinson bill, I am afraid. That is one of the gestures we have to watch. It therefore appears necessary that we shall not allow this bill to be misunderstood, unless I am wrong at this particular time and am again on the other side, as the Senator from Alabama accuses me. It therefore appears that the logic of the Senator from Alabama is that perhaps we had better not let the Senate get behind the Vinson bill, because it does not pay the soldier any money. Under the Vinson bill the soldier would not get a dime. We can pass the Vinson bill and the President can sign it, but it only gives the right to do certain things; it does not appropriate a dollar, and it does not accomplish a real thing for the soldier. If its sponsors should get the Vinson bill passed, we would find that it only authorizes the issuance of bonds and the payment of some interest on bonds by the United States Government.

One thing about the Patman bill is that it gives $2,100,000,000 to the men who put muskets on their shoulders, and it does not cost the Government one dime in interest to any bank, and does not load us down with any future debt. It would do the country good. It would give us money to spend. It would stimulate the wheels of business and industry. It would pay off a debt the payment of which has been promised to these men since 1917 or 1918.

All of us are supposed to be veterans of the war, either in a private capacity or as a soldier, one way or the other. I was not as much of a private or as much of a soldier as others sitting in this body. I neither went to war nor did I vote to send anybody to war. It seems to me that those of us who did not attend the struggle should be the last ones to complain about the payment of the bonus which does—what? It is a bonus which merely equalizes the amount of money that the soldier already has received with what was received during the same length of service by the commonest laborer of that day and time. In other words, if the soldier gets every dime of this money in cash—and he will not get it unless we go through something like we did here last year with the Frazier-Lemke bill—he will get for the services he performed only a wage which equals what the common laboring man got for the same length of time out of his service.

How many know that? All the publicity which has been given about the soldiers' bonus has been of the most prejudicial kind, as though it was a balm being given to someone. It has undertaken to create the impression that the bonus is going to give the soldier some undue sum of money over and above what he would have earned in private life, when, as a matter of fact, it was properly termed an "adjusted compensation" under which the soldier who received a dollar a day is raised up to the standard of the $3 or $4 a day laborer doing the same time when he was in the trenches and when the common ordinary laborer was not taking any chance of being shot at.

It is, therefore, very apparent that the soldier finds himself in the hands of very clever political strategists. He finds himself being bounced back and forth with something that has a bonus label around it, and that is about all it has. He finds that it is tossed here and it is tossed there. Some bond or some stock or something that looks good or has a fine appearance of some kind is going to be given to him, and it is said it will be a benefit to the soldier, when, as a matter of fact, it is not intended to be any such thing, because it is going to cost the Government too much money.

I see this matter going only one way. If we vote against the Patman bill, we are not going to vote the soldier anything at all. I would rather not have it, if I were a soldier. I would rather have no bill than one which gives a mere shadow and carries no substance with it.

The Harrison bill would pay the soldier, I believe, about $175 or $180. The man who has already taken his certificate and obtained what he can on it will now be allowed, under the Harrison amendment, about $175 or $180. That is what I am told by Senators who have calculated the matter. Therefore, we come back to the veteran of the war with $175 or $180, provided we allow a certain amount of discount to be taken by the men dealing in Government bonds and the bankers who are discounting the notes which the Government is putting out for money. That is the only way we can get it under the Harrison bill.

The Vinson bill is probably not as good as the Harrison bill. I have not a copy of the Vinson bill here.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure the Senator knows what is in the proposition; but under the Finance Committee amendment the veterans can get bonds bearing 3 percent or they can get cash.

Mr. LONG. Nobody wants bonds in this day and time, because bonds do not do anyone any good. There is not 1 soldier out of 250 who does not need the money. I base that statement on my judgment and what I know about people and about veterans.

Mr. HARRISON. The bonds are selling at 103 or 104.

Mr. LONG. Suppose they sell above par. The bonds will not sell that high.

Mr. HARRISON. We have a provision in the bill that they shall not be bought by anybody at less than par.

Mr. LONG. That would give the veteran $175 or $180. That is the bonus payment, $175 to the soldier under the Harrison amendment. The Vinson bill would not give him anything at all. The Vinson bill is just an empty gesture. If I understand its terms, the Vinson bill is just an empty gesture. If we pass the Vinson bill without some other affirmative action by Congress, we do not give the soldier a 10-cent piece. If I am in error about that, I should like to be corrected.

Therefore let us put the Senate on record right down the line. Let us put the Senate where it belongs on the matter. Are we with the House or not? The House has gone on record. The House has passed the Patman bill, which carries a definite, stipulated, substantial bonus to the soldier that we have owed him since 1918. The House has done its duty. What reason has the Senate to hide behind something on the ground of fear of a veto?

The House has had the courage—one of few times in this and the last Congress—to beard the lion in his den, and it has done what it should have done. It passed a bonus bill to pay these men what we owe them, and what we ought to have paid them many years ago. The House has done its part. Let the Senate now stand up on its hind legs and vote with the House and make the Patman bill the law in the shortest, quickest, most reasonable way it can be done.

I was not in favor of the strategy which was adopted here a few minutes ago. I think we ought to figure out a way to get the Patman bill to a vote first. I could not figure it out quickly enough, and I was relying on the ideas of more able parliamentarians than I am. They are better parliamentarians than I am, but they are not half as good politicians as I am and are likely to figure the thing out in the wrong way. I believe they made a mistake. I really think we ought to revise the Patman bill in some minor way and offer it as a substitute for the Harrison bill. I do not believe my Republican brethren across the aisle and some of my conservative brethren on this side of the aisle can afford to vote down the Patman bill and vote for the Harrison bill.

I do not believe we can do that. In other words, I think the soldier stands in a position where, as between the Harrison bill and the Patman bill, nearly every Member of Congress will see the necessity of doing something better than the Harrison bill proposes to do. That is a different proposition than the other bill.

So, Mr. President, I hope all of us who want the soldiers' bonus paid will stand together. I think we ought to stand on one common line here by tomorrow morning. I do not suppose any effort is to be made to take a vote this evening, is there? Is any vote to be taken on the bill this evening?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I had hoped we might secure a unanimous-consent agreement that tomorrow, say, at 1 o'clock, or at some other time, we would vote on the so-called "Vinson substitute." I have no desire to try to press for a vote this afternoon, but I did hope we could get that agreement for tomorrow. Would that meet the Senator's view? That would give him time to "get together" on something.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not know that I should have any personal objection to that. A number of Senators are not here this evening. It is rather late. I notice that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] is not here. I do not know how he, or others who are not here, would feel about the matter. I do not know that I should have any particular objection; but what I am undertaking now to do is to avoid our being placed in a situation where these diplomatic Republicans and Democrats can get together.

In other words, there is a necessity here for dividing the army. Let us let them put one another "in bad" just as far as they can unless they come with us.

That is my view about this matter. The only way we are ever going to get justice here is to keep these fellows from getting friendly; and it seems to me they will have too many chances to justify their stand if we let them hide behind the Vinson bill. They will say: "Oh, well, you know, that is a pretty good bill, and a lot of the boys want it", and this and that and the other. "We did the best we could. It provides for all the money, and we will blame the President." That is what the Republicans will do, of course. They will go out and say, "We will blame the President for it. We passed the bonus bill, and he did not pay the bonus, and he did not provide the money after we voted it. He could pay it out of the public-works fund if he wanted to. He could pay it out of something else if he wanted to"; but in the meantime the soldier will not get any bonus.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. Does the Senator understand that the American Legion is advocating the passage of the Vinson bill?

Mr. LONG. I understood that their convention did; but nearly all the letters I have received from soldiers tell me that they want the Patman bill. I understood that the American Legion did adopt some kind of a resolution for the Vinson bill; but, if they did, they adopted a resolution endorsing something that would not pay a soldier a dollar. I do not care whether the American Legion did it or not. If they have endorsed a bill that will not pay a soldier a thin dime, they have made a bad mistake. That is the way I look at the matter; and if the American Legion did that, they have left themselves without anything to pay themselves anything with.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. When the American Legion met in its last national convention the Vinson bill was not in existence. The only bill in existence was the Patman bill; so, when the Legion went on record in favor of the payment of the bonus, it must have gone on record in favor of the Patman bill.

After the convention was over, and Congress had convened, or about that time, the legislative committee of the American Legion met somewhere and evidently devised the Vinson bill, and the Vinson bill was introduced in the House; but the Vinson bill has come into existence since the American Legion convention went on record. The convention is on record in favor of the bonus; and the Patman bill being the only one before the country during the past few years, they must have been in favor of the Patman bill.

Mr. LONG. The Patman bill was introduced both in the Senate and in the House. I introduced it in the Senate. I took it from the House files and tried to attach it to a bill pending in the Senate as a rider; and it was the only proposal on the subject before the people at the time. I am sorry my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] has left the Chamber. If that convention met and endorsed the bonus, I should assume it thought it was voting for the bonus bill which at that time was pending in the Congress of the United States.

That is what I should have thought the convention was voting on; but, as the Senator from Oklahoma tells me, after this convention took a recess or adjourned and went out of business, the high muck-a-mucks met up here somewhere and drafted the Vinson bill. I do not know much about conventions, and I do not know much about these inner circles anyway; but if we could ascertain the personnel of the little clique that met and drafted the bill, I imagine we should find that there were not many lawyers in it who understood the bill as well as the general mass of the soldiers themselves would have understood it. I have not received a great many letters on the subject, because the soldiers know they do not have to write me. They know I am for the best bill. The soldiers know I am going to vote to pay them this money. They do not have to write me, because they know how I stand; but every letter I have received from a soldier, with the exception, I think, of one, told me they wanted the Patman bill, and that the Vinson bill would do no good at all.

That is the kind of correspondence I have received. The soldiers want the Patman bill; and anybody with enough gray matter to keep from being bored for a hollow horn would want a bill that paid them something instead of one that did not pay them anything.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Why does the Senator confine his statement to the soldiers, and say that the soldiers want the Patman bill? I receive letters from all types and classes of citizens in my State, whether they served in the war or not, favoring the Patman bill.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator from New Mexico. He contributes a very good line of thought. He states that he is getting letters from all types of people, and that all types of people want the Patman bill. The real business people want the Patman bill. I am not talking about the note-shavers and the market-riggers up here in Wall Street. I am not talking about the spider-web set that have to rake down about $9 out of every $10 a soldier gets before they can become patriotic. I am not talking about the set that fill the little banks with Argentine bonds, and then yell that the little banks ought to be closed up because the bonds are not any good. I am not talking about the set that hung out the Star-Spangled Banner, and hired a brass band to play 365 mornings out of 366, and then yelled as if they were going to be put out of business in case the soldiers were paid a bonus after they came back. I am not talking about the gang up there who have always been down here undertaking to rake off a billion or two billion dollars out of every Congress that ever met, but who are always raising a great, big bellow that the United States Government is going to be bankrupted if a billion dollars goes out to the soldiers. Congress has allowed that kind of trickery and those "hookama-crook" schemes from that Wall Street gang of market-rigging bankers to keep the soldier from ever cashing out on a bonus that has been promised him now for 18 or 19 straight consecutive years. Every time we come in here the soldier is told that in just a few more reaches he is going to get the bonus. It is always being put just a little bit away from him.

Mr. SMITH. "Just around the corner."

Mr. LONG. "Just around the corner", the Senator from South Carolina says. Bless your soul, we are right back with Brother Herbert Hoover again. [Laughter.] We never will get away from him. Just as surely as that man lives, he will be made a saint. I do not think he is a Catholic, but neither am I; but if he will change his religion, I will bet a hundred dollars the Pope will make him a saint before next year. [Laughter.]

There has never been a man who has lived as long in thought and in action as Mr. Hoover. He is being followed, and his precepts are being observed today like those of no other living man. He is being outdone—yes, sir! "John Brown's body lies a-mould'ring in the grave", but his work goes marching on. Herbert Hoover is in Palo Alto, however, and he is being outdone every day. He does not have to die in order to have his examples live. He can stay alive and see them going on.

No man on the living earth deserves a birthday cake with twice as many candles on it as he is years old as Hoover does; and today those who follow his example are still coming around and saying, "Just around the corner; just around the corner." Here is the Vinson bill, which authorizes the issuance of bonds if and when and as the authorities want to issue them, and if and when and as, and as not, they appropriate the money to pay the bonds.

Then comes this blessed amendment which the Senate Finance Committee sends here, through its illustrious chairman, my neighbor from over in the State of Mississippi, who bustles in here with this thing.

$175! $175! $175! Is not that a remarkable thing? One hundred and seventy-five cold simoleons, $175—giving the soldier just about as much money as one of these Representatives or Senators drew for the time it took him to decide on whether he would vote to declare war or not.

Let us see. We get $10,000 a year. That is $30 a day, and $175 would just about equal the pay for 6 days. So they are going to pay $175 to the man who faced the musket and acted as the cannon fodder, who went 3,000 miles away to make the world safe for democracy, and then later came back to find that democracy was not only made unsafe over there, but a dictatorship was to be established over here, if possible. They are now going to feel sorry and fall down on their knees and say they are doing justice when the soldier will get just exactly as much money as the Congressman got for 6 days while he was deliberating as to whether he would or would not send the soldiers to war. That is a nice thing, the equivalent of 6 days' pay of the Congressman who was deliberating as to whether he would put the man in the trench or not, to be given to the man who accidentally got back from the trench, if he got back.

Of course, this does not take into consideration the chance the man took of never coming back. Oh, we made some wonderful speeches in those days when the young men were being sent "over there." Yes, sir; they sang all the songs and the bands all played, and everything was going to be simply hunky-dory when they got back. Not only were they going to kill the fatted calf, not only were they going to put princely robing on the back of the prodigal son when he returned from overseas; there was not going to be one calf only, they were going to kill a flock of yearlings, and they were going to put on him such a shining robe as would have put the Queen of Sheba to shame. Nothing was to be too good for the soldiers when they returned from the war.

Mr. President, I had two brothers-in-law who came back. Both of them had jobs when the war broke out, and were making a good living, working in the oil fields, drawing anywhere from $200 to $250 a month. They were sent over there and they were ordered about over the country and on the seas, in the Army and in the Navy. One of them came back with a trouble from which he has never been able to recover, the other with practically no health at all. Neither of them has ever been able to get a job he could hold any length of time, because they were physically unable to work. Neither of them was found to be within the classification where he could get anything out of the Government. They went away good men, they came back physical wrecks.

I saw many other young men, some of them lawyers, going away, giving up any chance they had to practice. The flags were flying, the bands were playing, Congressmen were making fine, eloquent speeches. Everywhere we heard "Over There! Over There! Over There!"

Now, what have they over here? All we hear is "$175"! The patriotism of the American Senate has finally gotten down from making the world safe for democracy to $175 a head, provided we let the banker have a shave of about that much before the soldier gets it.

God bless the bankers! God bless the bankers! Never let them lose out in this country. Never come into the Halls of Congress, if you know anything about passing legislation, undertaking to give something to a soldier or to anyone else, unless you tie a string to it and give some banker part of it. If you try it, the legislation will not go through. Put something on it that will give a rake-off or a shave for the Wall Street element, and you will have a better chance. That is this case.

Bonds! More bonds! How many bonds do you want? There are about $30,000,000,000 of bonds outstanding now. A law has just been passed under which $4,800,000,000 more of bonds will be issued, which will make about $35,000,000,000. There are two or three boards sitting around in Washington now—I have not added them all up—and I am told that they will require around $4,000,000,000 more.

If we lose in the next campaign—and as it is going on it looks as if we will—the other side will vote four or five billions of bonds. They want something. They are not going to let you play this game forever. They want to be in on it. You cannot expect them to let this thing dry up and they get nothing out of it. After we have had $5,000,000,000 they will want $5,000,000,000. If we have $5,000,000,000 now, how are we going to keep them from getting $5,000,000,000 themselves?

There will always be the necessity for a medium of exchange to carry on the business of the country, and as long as that kind of condition exists, there will be talk of "bonds, bonds, bonds", and there will be interest on the bonds.

The bond issues now are up to the point where there are outstanding thirty-one or thirty-two billion dollars of bonds of the United States Government, or bonds for which the United States Government is responsible. When I say the Government is responsible, I mean that, directly or indirectly, the Government is responsible for all the bonds issued for all these little organizations sitting around here in Washington.

Then there is a municipal bonded indebtedness of eighteen or twenty billion dollars, in addition. That makes $55,000,000,000 of bonds, or somewhere near that amount, and when we figure up the interest on the bonds and figure up the taxes the people of this country are paying today, we find that the interest on the debts and the taxes together amount to $28,000,000,000, against a national income of $42,000,000,000 figuring the public and private obligations of this country.

Every time there is passed a recovery measure for the assistance of the people, more bonds are issued, and every time bonds are issued the obligation of the people to pay the interest on the money is increased, the people are burdened with that much more of an obligation, and have less with which to discharge it. Still we go on and on, raking from the bottom and placing upon the top in bonds and bonds and interest on bonds multiplied.

Mr. President, I want the soldier to get something out of this bonus bill if it is to be passed. I want Senators who are in favor of the bill to understand one way in which that can be accomplished. Let us make up our minds that we will stand for the method that will best accomplish the enactment of the Patman bill. If voting down the Vinson bill will come nearer doing it, let us do that, because, remember, we are getting nothing with the Vinson bill, and practically nothing with the Harrison bill. We must either get the Patman bill or nothing.

I wish to say to Senators that, in my opinion, a vote for any other bill than the Patman bill is not a vote for the bonus. No other bill provides enough to be a bonus. The only bill that will provide anything at all is the Patman bill. Therefore, I think we had better change our minds.

I want Senators to think this matter over. I think we had better change our minds and vote against the Vinson bill, and then vote for the Patman bill as against the Harrison bill. I would vote for the Patman bill as against the Vinson bill, but there are many more votes to be had in favor of the Patman bill as against the Harrison bill than there are votes to be had in favor of the Patman bill as against the Vinson bill.

For that reason I think we should take the most practical course and undertake to pass the Patman bill.

I shall not delay a vote on this bill. I have only spoken here this afternoon for some 30 minutes. I do not intend to detain the Senate very much longer. I hope the Senate will not get caught in a strategic position by which there is an escape for men who might vote for the Patman bill unless we colored the situation to where their conscience was satisfied with something else. I desire to take a practical course. So let us take a practical course. Let us come back here tomorrow and vote down the Vinson bill and then vote for the Patman bill against the Harrison bill.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not think there is any desire to discuss the bill further this afternoon. Several Senators have left the Chamber thinking there would not be a vote today. So I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair), laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely the nomination of Henry B. Foster to be postmaster at Haleyville, Ala., in place of F. M. Johnson, resigned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. HARRISON. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, May 3, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 2 (legislative day of May 1), 1935

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

John R. Putnam, of Oregon, now a Foreign Service officer of class 3 and a consul, to be a consul general of the United States of America.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 2, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou merciful God, imminent in all things, in Thee we have our strength and comfort, our inspiration and hope; we earnestly entreat Thee to hear our prayer. We would join with all noble souls in warring against crime, greed, and injustice. We beseech Thee to dominate us with the spirit that is consecrated to the work of deliverance from the evils that blight youthhood and lessen the resistance of manhood. Father in Heaven, graciously bless and direct the churches and the schools of our land. To these we owe our best hopes and our highest thoughts, which influence and mold the national mind. Let the standard of the Lord be lifted up, bringing forth judgment and unto victory. If enemies come in like a flood, O may the rivers of Palestine flow this way, enabling us to speak the brave word, do the brave deed, and live the brave life. In the name of Jesus our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PATRIOTISM AND SECURITY

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address which I delivered yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the address which I delivered at patriotic May Day exercises in Uniontown, Pa., May 1, 1935, as follows:

Friends, I am happy to be back home with you this glorious day. I bring you greetings from the Nation's Capital.

I am happy, indeed, to bring with me the nine national defense birds that just maneuvered in the air over your city.

I am proud of the people of my county and my county seat. I congratulate the patriotic organizations of Fayette County who worked so faithfully to bring about this splendid demonstration.

Occasions like this buoy us up to a feeling of pride. We term such demonstrations as this "patriotic demonstrations."

Indeed the teachings and significances of such demonstrations are of such value that we cannot in any way weigh their importance.

However, my friends, patriotism and love of country are one and the same thing. As we study the history of the nations of the past we find that they were all demonstrative when it came to what we term "patriotic celebrations."

As we look back over the highway of time we see nation after nation on the scrap heap along this highway. Nation after nation played its part on the stage of action since the beginning of recorded history.

We sometimes ask ourselves: Why these powerful nations of the past did not continue to be powerful? Why they were not able to perpetuate themselves for all time?

When we delve into the reason for the fall and decay of nations, we find that they were ever the same.

Nations, like individuals, decay when they are overawed with greed—the spirit of conquest—and selfishness.

Nations, like men, decay and lose their power when they forget to protect the spiritual features that nature intends and demands of all people in all nations.

To be patriotic one must be ever active in the institutions of a community and a nation that are designed to build better citizens.

Rome fell because the Huns and vandals from the north came down and overpowered her. This, however, did not happen until the Roman social, political, and spiritual institutions had gone to seed, and when this happened the forces brought the Roman Empire to her knees. The same thing happened to other great nations of the past.

My friends, here in America, we have nothing to fear from without. If we maintain an adequate national defense and keep our institutions, our homes, our schools, and our churches imbued with the fundamental principle of honesty, sincerity, and the spirit of right, no foe will ever cross our frontier or pull down the Stars and Stripes.

Patriotism is ever the same; all peoples, in all ages, in all lands, have been patriotic. When a crisis would come to their nation they would rally to defend the emblem or flag that stood for their freedom and their rights.

Patriotism is the same today as when that farmer, Israel Putnam, left his horses and plow in the field in Massachusetts and headed a band of citizens to drive the "red coats" back across the sea.

Patriotism is the same today as when Abraham Lincoln said, "This Nation, under God, shall not perish from the earth."

Patriotism is the same today as when Nathan Hale lamented that he has "but one life to live for his country."

Yes, my friends, patriotism is more than words—it is a practice of the activities that has to do with building better citizens out of our boys and girls.

If we are truly patriotic, we will ever strive to hand to our children and our children's children better institutions than our fathers handed to us.

We will hand them better schools, better homes, better churches.

We cannot consider ourselves truly patriotic if we remove the forest from the hillsides and do not replace the same.

We cannot consider ourselves truly patriotic if we pollute our streams with poison and make no effort to cleanse them.

We cannot consider ourselves truly patriotic if we take nature's wealth in coal, oil, and other minerals from the earth and leave nothing to our posterity to take its place.

We cannot consider ourselves truly patriotic if we leave the soil of our fathers and our farms less rich than when our fathers handed it on to us.

My friends, to be patriotic, we must sacrifice our time, our energy, and our material possessions, if necessary, in order that we may hand on to posterity a community and a nation that is a better place in which to live than it was when we found it.

We must imbue into the very souls of our children this American's creed:

"I believe in the United States of America as a Government of the people, by the people, for the people, whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a Republic; a sovereign Nation of many sovereign States; a perfect Union, one and inseparable, established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes.

"I, therefore, believe it is my duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag, and to defend it against all enemies."

I thank you.

SEE AMERICA FIRST

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including a radio address which I delivered a few days ago from a local radio station.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend by remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio April 23, 1935:

Springing as we do from a race of pioneers, the American people are a nation of travelers. The spirit of vagabondia is strong in the breast of every American. However, with no new territories to be explored, with no new borders to be traversed, with no new frontiers to be established, we have in our love for travel allowed ourselves to be lured to distant places beyond the seas when greater scenic marvels abound close by. To most of us, living in the most beautiful scenic country in the world, the idea of travel, as much as it is to be regretted, has now become synonymous with thoughts of a visit to a distant foreign shore.

To stimulate travel at home, to bring about a movement of our people within the borders of our own country, apparently it is necessary to provide a new appeal. Because we live so close to our natural beauties we are prone to discount them; we fail to see the forest because of the trees. For this reason, in the hope that with their attention called sharply to the beauties of nature and the mavels of man's handiwork with which America abounds, I have introduced House Joint Resolution 224. This resolution provides that each of the years of 1935 and 1936, by virtue of a proclamation by the President of the United States, shall be designated and known as "See America Year."

Pledges of support of this measure have been most enthusiastic. Already the National Park Service and the National Forest Service have promised their full cooperation. These important governmental agencies have under their jurisdiction the world's most scenic attractions to which they are constantly adding. Their promised assistance augers success to this movement.

Enthusiastic support is being given this measure by the See America First League, by the San Joaquin Valley Tourist and Travel Association, by chambers of commerce, and other civic organizations throughout the United States. Daily there arrive in my office dozens of endorsements from various chapters of the Hotel Greeters of America, from hotel operators, from business men, from all classes and kinds.

Should not the East know the West, the West the East?

As a son of the Golden West, raised within a few miles of California's greatest scenic areas, I forever marvel at the wonders, natural and man made, to be found in such profusion in our Eastern States. As a Californian, I am enthralled by the glories and the unmatched beauty of this famed cradle of democracy. Why, I ask myself, do not my fellows of the west coast fully appreciate that which is the marvelous beauty of our eastern coastal States? The wonder of it all is lost upon them because no organized effort has ever been made, through a systematic educational campaign, to impress them with the wonders with which the home country is so generously endowed.

You, our easterners, have heard of the rugged beauty of the world-famous Yosemite Valley, with its mighty waterfalls, with its vaulting granite domes, with its shaded grass-carpeted vales and meadows, with its natural beauty unsurpassed.

You, our easterners, have heard of the magnificence of General Grant and Sequoia National Parks of central California, wherein are contained the giant sequoias—trees which are the oldest living things upon the face of this earth—trees which were old when Christ was born nearly 2,000 years ago.

You, our easterners, have heard of the icy grandeur of Glacier National Park, of the unbelievable wonders of the Yellowstone, of the magnificence of the Grand Canyon.

You, our easterners, have, perhaps, not visited the beautiful city of San Diego, where, during the balance of this year, there will be held an exposition—an exposition symbolizing the birth of a new era of development in the West. Here you may view the wonders of present-day industry and commerce—rare relics of art, the magical wonders of science—all amid surroundings exquisite in their architectural perfection.

You, our easterners, have, perhaps, not visited San Francisco, that glorious city of romance which lies in the shadow of the Golden Gate. You, perhaps, have not seen the Mount Shasta's towering, snow-capped peak. You, perhaps, have not experienced the thrills of a glorious moonlight night on the white-sanded beaches of southern California.

If you have not availed yourself of the opportunity of visiting these scenes of grandeur, it is undoubtedly for the same reason we of the West have not rested our eyes upon the equally glamorous attractions of the East; that is, merely because your attention has not been forcibly directed, by those upon whom the responsibility rests, to the priceless possessions of our fatherland. It is our hope that a proclamation by our beloved President, calling to our attention our national wonderlands, will serve as a clarion call to visit and see that of which America is proudest.

Washington, the most beautiful capital city in the world, is not fully appreciated by the people of this Nation. Oh, we boast of our Capital, with its spacious parks, with its magnificent buildings, with its beautiful statues, with its splendid hotels—hotels to meet the purse of every man. Yes; we boast of our Capital, but we do not visit it. Why? Because the beauties of which we boast have never been made vivid to us—our imagination has not been stirred to the point where inertia is overcome by the irresistible desire to gratify a craving of wanderlust.

Here, on the shores of the Potomac, this Nation has builded a dream city. In all the world there is not one that can compare with it. Designed to be the Capital of the greatest Nation this world is ever to know, its builders have never faltered as they labored down through the years to make their dream of dreams come true. Every American, the men and women who love this country of ours, should never rest until they can boast familiarity with the architectural marvels of our Nation's Capital. To know Washington is to live!

In what other Nation of the world will you find such a variety of attractions? Where, on the face of this earth, can you find another Grand Canyon, another Crater Lake, another Columbia River, another Shenandoah Valley, another area to compare with the Green Mountains of Vermont, another scene as sublimely beautiful as Maine's summer grandeur?

House Joint Resolution No. 224, strangely, is a recovery measure. And just as strangely, it is a recovery measure unlike any other recovery measure, in that it is one which will cost our Government not one cent. In America the business of caring for the tourist has come to be recognized as one of the first two or three industries of importance. What could aid recovery more than to stimulate travel among those who can afford to travel; to induce those who can afford it to spend their money pleasure bent?

Every railroad, every automobile manufacturer, every merchant, every service-station operator, every hotel man, every person who is engaged, partially or wholly, in catering to the traveler would benefit immeasurably by the passage of this resolution. And from this increased business an opportunity of employment for the now idle would follow as the night the day. With pay rolls increased and profits augmented, the tourist dollar would find its way into the pockets of everyone to the increased prosperity of all.

Less than a year ago President Roosevelt delivered an address from Glacier National Park. That address, broadcast over this Nation, immediately stimulated interest in travel. The work of our Civilian Conservation Corps has focused interest on our national parks, our national monuments, our national forests, our points of historical interest and scenic beauty. As a result of that stimulation, our national recovery has been brought a step nearer. If, through a campaign of publicity and the action of our President in proclaiming this and next year as "See America Year", we can increase that interest, we will be just that much nearer a better economic condition by all of us so devoutly desired.

Nature has been bountiful in her gifts to us. We have added to her gifts by creating shrines of historical interest. No one section of the United States has any corner on scenic beauty. Thus there is a field for him who would travel, either far from home or only a short distance from that place in which he lives.

Constantly are we developing the natural beauty which nature, with a lavish hand, has bestowed upon us. Within a few months the construction of a State road into the Kings River Canyon area in central California will be well toward completion. This road will open a vista which for rugged beauty, for unsurpassed grandeur, for sheer delight, cannot be matched in any portion of the world. This is a new field, a field which but a small handful of those who are in love with the beauties of nature have ever viewed—this is another of the frontiers, of the few remaining new vistas remaining within our borders.

We stand on the threshold of complete economic recovery. Let us get behind and promote this "See America Year" movement, which, in addition to affording you the delight of knowing something of the wonders of our own country, will, at no cost to our Government, speed that recovery and assist so much in lifting our beloved Nation out of the abyss of depressionistic despair.

BANKING BILL

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in the course of my remarks on the banking bill, I quoted from a mimeographed circular sent to all the Members of the House and signed by the gentleman from Texas, Mr. PATMAN. Only the first paragraph of that circular was particularly material to the discussion I was carrying on at that time, but I believe it would be informative to put the entire circular in the RECORD, because all three paragraphs are germane to the pending banking bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The letter of the gentleman from Texas is in yesterday's RECORD. It is in the first part of yesterday's RECORD.

Mr. PATMAN. I appreciate the interest the gentleman is manifesting, but the circular referred to is in the RECORD at page 6713, at the beginning of the proceedings.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Then I withdraw the request to insert it in the RECORD, and, Mr. Speaker, in connection therewith and in connection with my own remarks, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own summary in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. By way of a summary, let me point out by progressive steps how the pending banking bill will vest control of banking in a small group which may some day prove disastrous to the people of this country.

First. We make the Federal Reserve Board more responsive to the administration by requiring that appointees to that Board need only be persons of education and experience in lieu of the qualifications now existing in the law. That means that Mr. Hopkins or Mr. Tugwell or Mr. Moley could be appointed to that Board.

Second. The Governor of the Federal Reserve banks, whose position is not now provided for in the law but who in reality is the real executive of the Federal Reserve Bank is combined with the office of chairman of the Board and his selection must be approved by the Federal Reserve Board. The power to approve is equivalent to the power to appoint so that the Federal Reserve Board can virtually dictate who shall be the Governors of the 12 Federal Reserve banks.

Third. The Governor need not be a resident of the Federal Reserve district. In other words a New Yorker could be made Governor of the Chicago Federal Reserve bank or a person from Dallas could be made governor of the Minneapolis bank.

Fourth. The Federal Reserve Board is given full power to raise or lower the reserve requirements at will so that by raising the reserve requirements, they could drain capital from the West into the East or from small communities to the large financial centers. By lowering the requirements, they might conceivably raise the question of the sufficiency of the protection behind the deposits in the thousands of member banks of the system.

Fifth. Through complete control of open-market operations which embraces the purchase or sale not only of direct obligations of the Government but the contingent obligations on which principal and interest are guaranteed, such as H. O. L. C. bonds, Farm Credit Administration bonds, and all other Government securities included in the above classifications, the Board can completely control the volume and cost of credit. If they, as a matter of open-market policy, advise the purchase of Government securities, it increases the volume of money and lowers the cost; if they advise the sale of securities it decreases the volume and increases the cost. Heretofore, Federal Reserve banks could refuse to comply with this policy. If the present bill passes, they must comply. What is good for one section of the Nation may not be good for another but the Federal Reserve banks have no discretion in the matter. They must comply, whether for good or evil.

Sixth. While the law as to rediscount is not changed, this added authority conferred on the Board over Federal Reserve banks, for all practical purposes, gives them full control. Lowering the rates in the East and keeping them up in the West would drain huge amounts of money into the area where the rates are lowest. It would give them authority to penalize one section of the country as against another.

Seventh. Through its control over the system and over the Federal Reserve banks and the members of the Federal Reserve System, the Board can determine the interest rates to be paid on time deposits, it can discipline banks and remove directors, it can control bank examinations and admissions, and can say whether or not a bank shall be permitted to exercise trust powers and the right to act in a fiduciary capacity.

Eighth. Through this tremendous power, as I see it, the Board can be of material assistance in financing the public debt through the banks, whether the banks want to or not, and whether the depositors want their money invested in Government bonds or not. Suppose the Government wants more money for any one of a score of purposes. To obtain it requires an issue of bonds. This means increased debt. There must be a place to sell those bonds. To offer bonds that would not be accepted by the public through open subscription would prove disastrous to bond prices. They, therefore, must be in a position to force the sale of such additional bonds. This bill provides that additional authority. The Federal Reserve Board can through this immense power compel Federal Reserve banks to take such bonds, and the Federal Reserve banks, through control of rediscounts and their general authority over all member banks in the System, can by intimation and suggestion compel banks to accept more bonds, even though they might not desire to do so. Federal Reserve banks now hold two and one-half billion of such bonds and member banks hold more than eleven billions.

If ever enforced, liquidation should ensue; it would mean that Government bonds as well as other securities would have to be liquidated, and the result might be disastrous to the fiscal stability of the Nation.

Ninth. The authority conferred on the Federal Reserve Board in Public Act No. 291, passed by the Seventy-third Congress, providing for the regulation of security exchanges, when coupled with the additional powers in this bill, makes the Federal Reserve Board an agency that has life-and-death power over the entire United States and over all business.

That act gives to the Federal Reserve Board the authority to raise and lower margins on trading. It gives the Board authority by regulation to determine the initiation and maintenance of all credit except with respect to exempted securities, which are defined in the law as Government securities, both direct obligations and those on which the principal and interest is guaranteed.

That act gives the Federal Reserve Board authority to say how much credit a dealer, broker, or member of the exchange can extend and how it may be extended, and makes it unlawful to extend or maintain credit on any security other than Government securities in contravention of the rules and regulations of the Federal Reserve Board.

That act makes it unlawful for any broker, dealer, or member of a registered exchange to borrow money on any security, other than Government securities, unless he borrows from (1) a bank which is a member of the Federal Reserve System, (2) from a nonmember that has agreed in writing to comply with the provisions of the act, (3) or in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Board.

It is almost impossible for the finite mind to comprehend the immensity of that power. Through this plenary control of the Federal Reserve banks and all the member banks of the System, the Federal Reserve Board can, by rules and regulations, virtually compel the use of so-called "exempted" or Government securities for trading purposes and thereby create a need and a demand that will make it possible for them to finance all Government bonded indebtedness and restrict the use of all other securities on the market.

Tenth. It will concentrate in the hands of eight members of that Board, who will be responsive to the will and desire of the administration, irrespective of what administration may be in power, dictatorial powers heretofore undreamed of and will make them the money czars of the United States. It takes money and credit to do business, and this Board, through its control over all credit operations in this country, will have absolute control over business, commerce, and industry.

Could old Andrew Jackson return to the United States in 1935 and witness this granting of authority to a small group, he would indulge in a cynical laugh and say that Nicholas Biddle, the president of the Second Bank of the United States, who used his power to scatter despair and distress throughout the Nation and to discipline Congress and control the press, was a veritable amateur who might well take some lessons in the art of concentrating money power.

BANKING ACT OF 1935

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide for the sound, effective, and uninterrupted operation of the banking system, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7617, with Mr. WOODRUM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the Members of the House wish to get particular information relating to particular features of this bill, but since I am a rather new member of the committee, I prefer to call attention to certain of its features, as well as to criticize particularly title II. As a new member of this committee, but one who has served for 14 years on other committees, I pay a high compliment to its membership. It is composed of exceedingly able men. They certainly somewhat overawe me in my attempt to understand banking legislation; but sometimes a new man can still preserve his judgment unbiased because he has not been on the committee so long that his mind has embraced fixed opinions relating to finance. Too often, I fear, with older members it is like being a Methodist and believing that heaven can be reached by no other method. So I have had to apply the little common sense which I may have and the political experience acquired by 14 years in this body. In spite of my great admiration for the ability of the members of the committee, I still have left to me, I believe, the proper function of taking a different viewpoint regarding and being critical of several phases of this legislation.

I pay high tribute to the chairman, a delightful personality. His courtesy in the committee to me—a new member—in making my observations, has been deeply appreciated.

In commenting on this bill, I first mention title I, regarding which up to the present time, few, if any, adverse suggestions have been made.

Titles I and III are in fact not particularly objectionable, but let us not pass over title I without informing ourselves as to its general provisions. To put it broadly, the F. D. I. C. wishes to make this title in the bill so airtight that there will be but little need of insurance. I am, however, ready to vote for these requirements on our banks, since the insurance of deposits is new and we probably must follow the advice of the Department in charge of its administration. However, let us consider the attempt to force banks into the Federal Reserve System, the insistence that they carry proper burglary insurance; that they carry sufficient bonds to cover defalcations, which have been the cause of most recent bank failures; to subject them to more and more examinations, even to publish their condition in the local papers at any time, so that a depositor will know if they are not in satisfactory condition. In other words, we are to harass banks still further by yet more regulations.

Mr. Chairman, I shall go along with title I, but some of us who think highly of the integrity of those bankers, whom they represent should certainly wish to know how much they are to be further harassed in connection with the insurance features of this section of the measure. Right here may I say that I represent about 25 commercial banks in my own district. Every one of them I think is sound. No executive in these banks use them for their own particular private advantage. Nearly every one of those bankers I know. I know that they are all intensely proud of the fact they can be recognized as the "director of a bank." Most of them would give their last ounce of wealth to see that their bank did not fail, and they are worthy the confidence of the people whom they serve. Yet how they have been flayed in the general comments on the "money changers".

Mr. Chairman, we have in general painted the banker as a crook because we found that certain of them had been such as to deserve punishment, which has been swift and sure. But why try to stigmatize all bankers? Most of them are doing the best they can. Why have you so frightened them that they do not now dare to lend money? Why have you frightened them so much that they dare not pursue even the ordinary processes of their business? When will all this cease? Beginning on that day in March 1933, when they were stigmatized as money changers by the President of the United States, our bankers have, as a whole, endured much abuse, and they have, in consequence, become frightened of their own Government. They are still so frightened, Mr. Chairman, that they did not come before the Banking and Currency Committee, which is scarcely surprising. Even the best of them have made some mistakes, of course. Even the best of them do not want bared to the public, even today, the whole list of investments still held by their banks. They naturally prefer not to be subjected to examination by any possibly unfriendly committee; one so favorable to the views of the present administration as to be willing to acquiesce in the enactment of such legislation as is contained in title II. Our banks have even hesitated to go to the R. F. C. for more capital lest the people might think them to be in a weak condition.

The situation is such a delicate one that even the strongest banks of the country were urged to take capital from the R. F. C. so that the people might be led to believe that it was not a sign of weakness to accept such aid. Many banks responded and more than a billion dollars was thus added to the capital of our banks. The bank examiners insisted, "You cannot keep up these fictitious values. Get more capital and mark off these values carried on your books which have now become so greatly reduced in the market."

Mr. Chairman, for the last 2 years the bank examiners have in truth harrassed the banks of our country, in spite of the fact that our Comptroller sees fit to deny this assertion. May I say in justice to Mr. O'CONNOR, who has won me over, that I believe he is trying to do the right thing. I believe he is now much more considerate, but can anyone deny that for a long year and a half our banks have lived in fear of the bank examiner?

We are told that examiners are not to suggest to any bank that it must call a slow loan, so called. Ask any banker what the examiner's comment is on slow loans, and you will find that, although the slow loan which has to pay 6 percent or more really supports the bank, still they are continually harrassed by criticism of them. And even the President of the United States—to bear out what I have stated—recently declared, in effect, "Let us not have one department telling the banks to loosen up and another department of government through its examiners making it almost impossible for them to make loans."

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. Is it not true that most of our banks today are bulging with money and our bankers are anxious to make loans but cannot make them because of the very restrictions which the gentleman has mentioned?

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the banks today have plenty of money. The Government itself has a lot of money in the Treasury. We are not talking about the present dangers. The argument is advanced that this bill should be enacted under the head of emergency legislation. But there is no present emergency. However, those advocating this measure must realize that there will be an emergency if these huge spendings are to be long continued. Because of the present governmental expenditures, the banks are so frightened, the business men are so frightened, that they do not dare do business, and they are congregated here in Washington today in protest. Do you listen to your business men from back home, now assembled in this city urging us not to pass title II of this bill? They are begging us to cease these further so-called "reforms" that they may again dare to do business. They are telling us they will do $20,000,000,000 worth of business immediately if we will stop. Or are you listening only to the President of the United States, Hopkins, Ickes, and a few more, as against your own bankers and your own business men who have come here to protest? At this time they speak in no uncertain language. A year ago when they were here they said, "Let us cooperate and let us work together with the Government", but now they say that for a year they have tried to cooperate, but there has been no cooperation from the Government. Therefore they demand that we stop these things which will undermine still further the credit of the country.

This is not a political bill. Oh, no! Yesterday I asked my good friend the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] if he would vote for this bill if Andrew W. Mellon, whom I have heard abused day after day, for years, on the floor of this House, although he was a great Secretary in that he reduced the debt so greatly, were in office, and the gentleman said, "Yes; I would vote for it", and I believe he would. I believe he has more confidence in Andrew W. Mellon and his policies than he has in those who are now in charge of the Treasury.

Mr. SHORT. May I interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts long enough to say that it is most refreshing and gratifying to know there is at least one Member of the Congress who has the courage to stand up and speak a good word for the bankers. I think the majority of the bankers in your district and in my district and throughout the country are men of honor and integrity, and I wish to congratulate the gentleman on his statement.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina rose.

Mr. GIFFORD. There is much I have to say, and, while I do not want to yield, I have mentioned the gentleman's name, and I will be pleased to yield to him.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I appreciate what the gentleman has said and dislike to interrupt his speech, but I do want to state at this time that if he undertook seriously to create the impression that I would have more confidence in Mr. Mellon than I have in Governor Eccles and the other officials now associated with him, I must say that my good friend is a poor judge of human nature and he certainly could not keep books for me.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman well knows that was more a pleasantry than anything else.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I accept it in that way.

Mr. GIFFORD. And while we are on pleasantries, you should try to get my viewpoint. I am a Yankee and proud of it. I come from a place where Yankee bankers still exist, and the story goes that when you went to a Yankee banker for the purpose of borrowing money he has been known to say, "Speak up a little louder; I am a little deaf; and cut down the amount." [Laughter.]

And to rest myself, may I perpetrate another pleasantry which some of you may have heard, but which the bankers hold against me? I am not a banker, but I am really endeavoring to understand their problems. They know my vote is my own, and you Democrats who have known me for 14 years should know it by this time. But I wish to say to you that the bankers often remind me of this little story and many may still be of this type. Some of you have heard it, I know, but let it appear again. Mose went to a banker to borrow some money, and the banker looked at him, as all bankers are supposed to look under those circumstances, and finally said: "Mose, I have known you all my life and I will lend you this $25 if you will tell me which one of my eyes is a glass eye." Mose said, "I can tell you right off. It is yo' left eye." The banker said, "Mose, my friends say that they cannot tell them apart, so how could you tell that it is my left?" "Well, Boss, when I told you my story, your left eye was the most sympathetic." [Laughter.]

I have had the same experience with bankers that most of you have had. They are not always willing to appear sympathetic toward my needs, but those whom I have known represent the finest type of our citizenship and have regard for the trust imposed in them.

Under title I, Massachusetts mutual savings banks seem to prefer not to be included. Why should they be penalized in order to insure all the banks in the country and especially in other areas where conditions of banking are particularly dangerous, as evidenced by past unfortunate experience? Why is the same rate imposed on all banks? Is that proper insurance? Insurance companies have different rates for their risks, based upon the possibility of loss under given conditions. Also, why should the banks pay insurance premiums on the total deposits rather than on the amount of deposits insured? Have any of the banks in your district been paying insurance on the total deposits?

Are we deliberately encouraging split deposits? Are we encouraging people to carry $5,000 in one name and a deposit in another bank in someone else's name?

The question came up, "If the treasurer of a municipality carries one deposit for all departments, are the several departments each insured for $5,000?"

The answer was helpful but somewhat evasive. It was, "Up to date we have not had any particular trouble about it." Later this may cause trouble, and the matter will have to be clarified further. After another year's experience, many other amendments to title I will probably be needed.

Now as to title II, is it in fact required by the necessities of the present? I deny that the necessities of the present moment require this hasty action. Much further study and the advice and assent of many others is most desirable. This title is supposed to be the work of Governor Eccles. Bankers hesitate to oppose it because it has the backing of the President and particularly of Mr. Eccles. We had too little testimony relating to title II—scarcely any, in fact—except that of Governor Eccles, and he is the man who said he was not greatly concerned about a debt of $40,000,000,000, thus lending aid and comfort to bonus seekers and all other people who want to raid the Treasury. He said it might be advisable to balance the Budget once in a period of 5 years, but it would probably be necessary only once in 10 years. When the business men and the bankers of this country read that kind of testimony presented by the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board can you wonder that their confidence in the Government vanishes? Yet he is actually the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. If he did not please the President, he stated, he might be supplanted at any time.

Under this bill governors of the Board may come and go at the will of the President. Is this politics? No sure tenure of office! Must follow the wishes of the President! Necessarily it means the Government and the administration in power. Of course this is politics, and the administration is generally opposite in its views to the other. Banking should be taken entirely out of government, which, of course, is politics in this country. It should be turned over, as in England, to an absolutely independent body looking after agriculture, industry, and commerce, but working in harmony with the Government, knowing, of course, that you must cooperate with the Government in its necessities.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LUCKEY. Does not the gentleman know that from 1920 to 1932 we had over 10,800 bank failures in this country, while in Canada they had only 3, and in England not a single one?

Mr. GIFFORD. I understand that and the English system appeals to me, but the Canadian system does not. My dear man, in Canada they drain the whole countryside for the benefit of the large centers of population. They can get few loans in the sparsely settled district. Do not start me on branch banking, lest I curse it. [Applause.] Do not part us from our independent banker, who knows us and knows our character and can intelligently pass on our loans. Do not allow a branch bank to come in and drain our resources and hand nothing back. Go into Canada and view the countryside and study conditions, and then approve it, if you can.

But that is not a part of this bill, though I have no doubt an amendment will be offered to permit of branch-banking extension, also an amendment relating to the commodity dollar. Read those basic things that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] put into the RECORD. He did not mention salt and pepper and a number of other things among the 700 or more, formerly mentioned in connection with finding the average cost of living. I find that of my salary, and the money I make, a very small percentage goes for the basic things which the gentleman mentions. I pay insurance and taxes, interest and traveling expenses, and perhaps try to save a dollar for the savings bank, while he wants to regulate only that part of the dollar spent for commodities. Tell him to be very careful with the rest of your dollar and tell him that until he adopts England's policy, wherein wages and trade and commerce are included, as well as basic commodities, then, and not until then, will we join in even the consideration of such a doctrine. We have listened to the commodity-dollar argument for years. I have listened to such arguments in the anterooms for a long time, and when I was put on this committee I thought that I should hear something new and more convincing. The amendment will be offered, but I do not believe the House will approve such innovation. The Banking and Currency Committee did not. Now, I admire the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. He knows so much more about banks and banking than I do that I feel afraid sometime to venture a question concerning a matter which he so fully endorses.

The banks today are holding 44 percent of our Government securities. Thirty-nine percent of the assets of the member banks consist of United States securities. They will be required to buy billions more. Everyone is here in Washington now to get a piece of pie out of the $5,000,000,000. They know the money is going to be spent, but it will have to be borrowed from the banks first. After the war we had a ceiling of debt of only $26,000,000,000, and now we will have $40,000,000,000 or more. But even after the war, with only $26,000,000,000 of debt, we sold Government bonds for as low as 80, when we needed cash to pay our bills or to enter into private business.

Is there any man so lacking in common sense as not to recognize the danger from the absorption of this huge amount of Government securities by our banks?

I repeat again the words of President Coolidge, when he said "the more money you loan to the Government the less you will have to loan to the people." [Applause.] But under this new doctrine we are told that to get money and credit in the banks and bring back prosperity the Government must borrow; and if the banks do not conform, it will be "just too bad" for them. We will print the money. When we begin to print money, then we will be like that dear old lady who once came to me and said, "Give me one of those check books. It is so easy to pay bills that way." [Laughter.]

I asked of Governor Eccles, "Will you send me a letter that I may give to my creditors that I will be all right for 5 or even 10 years if I do not balance my budget? I need such a letter. It ought to be very helpful."

Ten years I could go along without balancing the budget; but he said, "Private credit is not like Government credit. We have new ideas these days. The Government borrows from itself. It creates credit." Yet it all has to be wrung from the people by taxation. This Congress has not the courage to dig up a dollar by taxation. The ballot box looms in front of us. When will that year ever come when we dare tax the people $1,000,000,000 more than the actual running expenses of the Government, with this interest charge, to reduce that debt by even that amount? We cannot possibly think of that year coming, certainly not now, or for many years to come.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. Speaking about balancing the Budget, how many individuals balance their budget? Any man who has a mortgage on his property who has earned an income that is sufficient to take care of the carrying charges and do his other purchasing has balanced his budget. The Nation is in the same position as the individual. The budget of no one is balanced in these days. We all have encumbrances and mortgages outside of our regular flow of income.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, I understand that; but I hope the gentleman will do with his mortgage as his bank requires, take off at least 5 percent for depreciation every year and lower it. Governor Eccles again told us that our income normally is $85,000,000,000. One percent of our income would take care of the interest on this debt. So why should we worry about a debt like that?

Mr. FORD of California. When business gets better under the present administration we will take care of it easily, because we are working out a self-liquidating recovery program which the gentleman does not understand. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, I am one of those pupils of Hopkins, who is "too damned dumb to understand it." [Laughter and applause.] Of course, I am one of those who ought, I suppose, to approve the handing out of $4,800,000,000 in the way and manner in which Hopkins and others have already spent those other billions. To be sure, we are told that they have now found a better way to do it, and we were promised that if we would pass that bill they were all prepared to spend the money. Careful plans were supposed to have been worked out. But now they seem to be further away than ever in even knowing how to spend it.

That is your well-rounded way of recovery which, as I say, I am "too damned dumb to understand." After all my experience here and in legislative bodies elsewhere, I am doomed to be one of those who cannot understand. The gentleman really means I do not agree with him. I do not, and I cannot, have confidence in such leaders in view of the repudiations of almost all the statements made in 1932; which statements I am sure the gentleman would like to have me repeat, and also in view of Governor Eccles' statements which I have presented to you. How can business and banking have any confidence? What did the President say in 1932 in his campaign promises?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am grateful that I have protection this morning. [Laughter.]

This is what the President said:

> It is an easy, subtle, and popular course for the Government to finance ever-increasing public works and other great projects by filling the banks with its evidences of debt; but straight thinking does not approve such a course. A policy of prudent economy will do more to revive business—

He was talking about Hoover, then, in 1932—> and absorb the unemployed than a continued policy of extravagant spending. For the latter makes slipping into the inflationary current an ever easier and more insidious process; and as Prof. E. W. Kemmerer has said of this current, "There are rapids below."

> The Democratic platform specifically declares: "We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards." That is plain English.

Right here I want to refer to good old England. She has gone off the gold standard many times, but she never has cheated, she never has repudiated her promises to her citizens by marking gold down by law to the equivalent of 59 cents on the dollar. No; like us, she did not dare part with her gold, but she said to her citizens that they could rest assured that when times got better they would get back the exact amount of gold promised. That is her managed currency, and she has a monetary authority which would not allow speculation, such as we permit in the motion-picture industry, where salaries are paid greater than that received by the President of the United States. England would not stand for the speculation we permit. The Bank of England has control of the currency, backed 100 percent in gold, except that issued for the Government, which is a fixed and definite amount, which cannot be increased without Government sanction. For a century she has gone on, unwilling to let the Government get control of her currency system. If the people of England thought the Government were trying to get control of her currency, "that which takes away the freedom of a people overnight", you certainly would hear from them.

We refuse to be guided by the lamp of her experience. The Supreme Court said it might be legal to repudiate—which we did—but it roundly cursed the procedure. It was not any decision of which to be proud, especially since we may repudiate again to the extent of bringing the dollar down to 50 cents. How can the people and the bankers have confidence in such experimenting in the very delicate matter of our currency? How is it possible to believe we can have recovery while these inflationary views prevail?

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman referred to the platform pledges and promises of the President. Does not the gentleman think it might be a good thing if the President were to take an afternoon off some day and read some of those campaign promises and pledges instead of listening to so many present-day theorists?

Mr. GIFFORD. The President recently told us over the radio that the only way he could get any proper viewpoint was to go fishing—preferably, I presume, on a yacht, where he could be very comfortable and not care whether or not he caught any fish—but way out there he could get the viewpoint of the people and know how the people feel. Do not pay any attention to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States in Washington or to our business men from all over the country coming here to advise us and tell us of their trials. They should go into the solitudes to learn and understand what our citizens really desire. Do Congressmen pay no attention to our industrial leaders, or is our interest to be purely political? I know the chairman of my committee—splendid gentleman that he is—feels probably that it is his duty to go along. I am not speaking for him, but I know he feels as I do about our country banker; that our country banker is the best type of man we have and that we should not harass him too much. We would like to get back to some of the old banking conditions that existed in many places throughout this Republic and would exist today except for the central control here in Washington. Every day States are being deprived of their State banks; they must be forced into this National System. The central authority says to the State banks: "We will discipline you so that you will have to join the Federal Reserve System." The present law states that they will have to come into the System by 1937, but in the pending bill we say to them that we will extend their lives a little longer. Cut off the dog's tail a little each day; it makes it so much easier for him. When you know a thing is wrong and that it should not be done, give him more time to get used to it.

You are proceeding with an effort to abolish holding companies. Each of us get thousands of letters on this matter. Is this tending toward recovery? Do not business men say to us, "Let us have less reform until recovery takes place"?

The President says, in effect, no, reform first; eliminate these evils; perform surgical operations while they are willing to be operated upon, while they are under the ether, while they do not dare to say anything.

The Committee on Banking and Currency, Mr. Chairman, has a real duty to perform. Its greatest duty today, however, is to bring back confidence to the people of this Nation so that recovery may get under way, instead of doing another hurtful political thing such as would be done if title II of the pending bill is enacted into law. Do you of the majority party really believe in it? Or is it still necessary for you to follow the desires or whim of the President? Many of us are placed in a difficult position; we want to vote for titles I and III, but there, sandwiched in between the two, is something we most certainly do not want to vote for, something which contains the elements of grave danger. Shall we vote for it all because we want the other two titles, which contain many perfecting amendments that should be passed? Shall we vote for the entire measure if we are defeated on a motion to recommit? These are hard questions for a legislator to determine. Perhaps we shall have done our duty when we protest against title II, hoping that in another body this obnoxious title will be deleted. Why change so fundamentally our Federal Reserve System?

Did the Federal Reserve fail us during the war? When has the Federal Reserve failed to cooperate with our Government up to the present time?

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks a paragraph from the Whaley-Eaton Service, a service with which most of the Members are familiar and which they respect.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

BANKING

The foregoing, together with enactment of the $4,800,000,000 work-relief bill, absolutely necessitates passage of the banking bill at this session. Reports that the administration would sanction separation of the 3 titles of the measure into 3 separate bills have no standing. The proposal is to be put through as a whole, and the administration will not risk even another 6 months of financing the deficits without having that complete control of banking which title II sets up.

The banks are in no position to make an effective protest. Some of them will be unable to pay dividends on the preference stock purchased by the R. F. C., which means that the latter will virtually take over the management. All banks are such heavy holders of Government bonds that their own fate is tied into the credit operations of the Treasury. No bank, for instance, would dare make a public announcement as follows: "Our depositors should understand that we are trading their money for Government bonds. You see how the Government is spending that money, which happens to be your deposits. Your cash is being taken over by the Government, just as it took over your gold." That would be a reasonably true statement of the fact, but it is obscured by the other fact that the depositor can always obtain Federal Reserve notes for his deposit because the Government will give notes for the bonds when necessity therefor occurs.

In spite of the foregoing, since some banks are restive, some measure of absolute coercion is required. That is why the banking bill must pass, because it gives unlimited authority to Washington to seize and use the legitimate bank deposits of the whole country. How far the process can go is indicated by the fact that the first proposal before the administration called for $12,000,000,000 for work relief and this was only gradually reduced to $4,800,000,000. But there is not much concealment of the fact that the administration will ask for just as much again and again if the pump is not now fully primed.

The main point is that the Government is making a series of forced loans and will get legislation to assure its ability to continue making such forced loans indefinitely hereafter.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in concluding, may I say that there are many interesting things in this banking bill, but under title III we are going into reverse action. Last year there was some reverse action. At that time the law was that no one could be a director of a country bank unless he owned a certain amount of stock. It was found that the smaller banks could not retain valuable directors, so the restriction was lessened last year. This year the effort is being made to change another thing. The act of 1933 provided that no executive of a bank in a country district could borrow money of his own bank, and 2 years was given in which to repay existing loans. Now, those men have just as much difficulty in paying their own bank in 2 years as we have in paying our loans in the same period. We are extending the time in title III, as we should. The venom against banks and bankers led Congress to enact too stringent measures in the Banking Act of 1933.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps at this point it might be well, in view of the remarks made by the gentleman from California, to state definitely what the President thinks about a balanced Budget. In his talk at Topeka, Kans., on September 14, 1932, the President stated:

I propose to exert through the Presidency, as I have done through the Governorship, every bit of influence I can in favor of a national movement to reorganize local government in the direction of eliminating a large part of the tax burden that now bears so heavily on the farmers of the Nation.

By our example at Washington itself we shall have the opportunity of pointing the way of economy to local government.

Again he stated:

I propose to you, my friends, and through you, that government of all kinds, big and little, be made solvent, and that the example be set by the President of the United States and his Cabinet.

Mr. Roosevelt lamented the fact that the tax burden was equivalent to $125 per year per person, and stated further:

This is an impossible economic condition. Quite apart from every man's own tax assessment that burden is a brake on any return to normal business activity. Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors, because they are a burden on production and can be paid only by production. If excessive, they are reflected in idle factories, tax-sold farms, and hence in hordes of the hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain.

And again he stated:

Let us have the courage to stop borrowing to meet continued deficits. Stop the deficits. And let us also have the courage to reverse the policies of Republican leaders and insist on a sound currency.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in closing, I want to make, as forcefully as I can, the fact that United States bonds were down to 80 when we had a debt of $26,000,000,000. When business needed the money and bonds were too plentiful they were sold at a discount. Today, with the banks holding 44 percent of them and 39 percent of their assets invested in them, what will be the effect on the banks themselves if these assets go down to 80 percent?

Mr. Chairman, I have one more request. There was one banker who had the courage to come before our committee. He was that very courageous former Member of Congress, Franklin Fort, of New Jersey. He came before us to tell us that this danger does exist. I ask unanimous consent that I may insert in the RECORD, in connection with my own remarks, a few of the remarks on that particular issue made by ex-Congressman Fort, of New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. FORT. I am coming to the major question of the Government bonds now. Of course, everybody recognizes that Government bonds are the premier security, but it still is a fact that realization on Government bonds for cash has to be accomplished in the market, and it certainly is a fact that twice in less than 15 years Government bonds have sold at 80 or below in the market.

The possibility of the policy that this act contemplates—I speak now of the declarations of policy in regard to it made by the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and the general understanding of it, namely, that its fundamental design, in part, is to increase the amount of holdings of Government bonds by commercial banks and the Federal Reserve Bank System. Today, gentlemen, Postal Savings funds are chiefly in Government bonds. Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation assets are almost entirely in Government bonds. Forty percent of the bank assets or more are in Government bonds. You now propose in this bill to still further increase the holdings of Government bonds by the Federal Reserve System. In other words, the first line of deposit protection, namely, the Postal Savings fund and the commercial banks, after the exhaustion of the present surplus reserves, which are temporarily the first protection of deposits, has got to be financed by selling Government bonds. Now, you are planning here to put the entire Reserve System into Government bonds. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation already is.

The net result is that if any kind of serious trouble develops any of these intangible, unreachable waves of public sentiment which result in the withdrawal of a substantial volume of bank deposits for any reason—war, further disturbance of financial conditions, the collapse of foreign central banks, as happened to us when Bank of England went in 1931, the disturbance of confidence through some crookedness on the part of some individual bankers, the fear of inflation on the part of conservative holders of large deposits, and what not—anything that happens to produce a substantial withdrawal of deposited money from the banks of the United States or the Postal Savings Fund System, must be followed by the immediate liquidation in large volume of United States Government bonds.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS].

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address my remarks to the much-controverted title II, which, of course, is the heart of the bill, and I hope you will hear me with patience. This measure is one that should not be dragged into politics. Every one of us should lay aside all partisanship, because this is the most important measure, as I see it, that has been placed before this Congress in this or any other session. It affects the happiness and welfare of every home in the Nation.

Through the centuries four methods of effectuating the transfer of goods and services have been evolved. In the dawn of civilization we find barter in vogue. As the wants of people expanded and traffic increased, two commodities, gold and silver, were finally adopted, and coined by the different governments into monetary units, having a certain weight and fineness, as mediums of exchange for all other commodities. Much has been said in this discussion about the commodity dollar; every dollar is a commodity dollar. If you use gold alone, you have a dollar of one commodity, and if you use both silver and gold you have a dollar of two commodities. As commerce continued to expand and as a result of the inadequacy of this metallic money to meet the demand, in the exercise of their sovereign powers, to make money and regulate its value in the interest of the people, governments turned to a paper currency, printing limited quantities of legal tender notes based on the credit of all the people. In the meantime, private institutions operating for gain, known as banks, contrived a new kind of money, a kind of phantom money that constitutes about nine-tenths of all our money and which is known as check or credit money. This kind of money is created out of debts, being based upon the promissory notes of individuals, which check or credit money when uncontrolled is subject to rapid inflation and deflation; alternately resulting in abnormally cheap money or high prices, and always accompanied by wild gambling, speculation. Then without rime or reason this credit or phantom money suddenly contracts, vanishes, and in turn results in extremely dear money or low prices, unemployment, and economic ruin. A man who borrows money in times of great credit inflation wakes up to find that the dollars he borrowed must be paid back with other dollars possessing two and three times the purchasing power of the dollar he borrowed. Is that an honest dollar? Or is it not a robber dollar? The President did say that he expected to get a currency that would be the same in purchasing power from one generation to another, and that would be an honest dollar. Unless you control this credit money, which is nine-tenths of all your money, which under the Constitution it is your duty to do, your dollar in a few months in its ups and downs in purchasing power will continue to result in more robbery, though within the law, than all the crooks and criminals perpetrate in a hundred years.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SWEENEY. The President of the United States, in his inaugural address, said it was time to drive the money changers from the temple of civilization. The gentleman is a member of the committee and interested in this legislation. Does the gentleman believe this bill will drive the money changers from the temple of civilization, or does he believe this bill will give the money changers a new lease on the temple?

Mr. CROSS of Texas. I believe this bill will redound finally in the interest of the banker, because what redounds to the interest of all of the people will redound to his interest. The banker is coaxed to greater and greater inflation without realizing what it is inevitably leading to, and then when the cyclone comes it wrecks him, fills your country with poverty, destroys the life savings of millions of people, and crime and distress follow in its wake. You will never get rid of crime until you get rid of the tremendous distress that drives people to crime.

Mr. Chairman, the present law provides no adequate control over this phantom money, or credit inflation and credit deflation, which the measure under consideration supplies. While this bill goes a long way in the right direction, and it has my whole-hearted support, yet I think it can be greatly improved by several amendments which will be offered, and which I hope will pass. In the law as it is, Congress not only failed to supply the Federal Reserve Board with adequate control over credit inflation and deflation, but failed to fix a goal to which it was to go and anchor. Now, why talk about giving more power to the Federal Reserve Board? Depressions and booms are like a battle. If you are going to have a scattered, ineffective control, you will lose every battle. You have got to have a commander in chief—one who can act promptly and decisively. Deflation and inflation stretches out and reacts like an accordion. In this bill adequate controls are given but no goal is set. Without a clearly defined mandate from Congress directing the Board to stabilize the purchasing power of our monetary unit—the dollar—covering some definite period, the Board as a result of pressure which inevitably will be put upon it by powerful, selfish, speculative groups will be unable to function as it should.

The testimony of the members of the Federal Reserve Board, as well as others in a position to know, given before the Banking and Currency Committees of the House and Senate, shows in what a confused, perplexed state of mind they were as the result of Congress not giving them a specific mandate, setting a goal for which they should strive.

Governor Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, in the Federal Reserve Bulletin of February 1920, on page 117, said that our monetary system is—

> A good deal like a ship at sea without adequate equipment of rudder and compass to guide it.

Dr. Miller, of the Federal Reserve Board, in testifying on H. R. 11806 in 1928, said:

> It is my opinion that the Federal Reserve mind at the present time is more perplexed than it has been since the troublesome period of 1920–21; that it is in a state of mental confusion.

Dr. Miller again in testifying before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in 1931 said:

> It was my opinion, expressed several times in discussions at Federal Reserve meetings in the opening months of the year 1929, that the Federal Reserve System was drifting; that it was in the midst of a perilous situation without a policy.

In testifying before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate in June 1932, Mr. Russell C. Leffingwell, a prominent banker and a partner of J. P. Morgan & Co., and who was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury during the Wilson administration, said:

> It is evident that the Federal Reserve System failed to control the inflation and has as yet failed to control the deflation. Ultimately the New York discount rate was raised to 6 percent in August 1929, but the country paid dearly for the months of delay and indecision in the superinflation of that year. Similarly the System has been unable to evolve and operate and persist in an effective policy to counteract the deflation in the last 3 years. Its antideflationary policy has found only hesitant, tardy, and intermittent expression in action. In matter of monetary management, in the control of inflation and deflation, a stitch in time saves nine. Twelve scattered banks, each with its governor and its chairman and its board of directors, loosely ruled by a board of eight in Washington, composed of men of diverse opinions, do not provide the country with an organization well adapted to act promptly and decisively. Some remedy must be found for this.

And bearing on the question of Congress fixing a price level, and in so doing stabilizing the purchasing power of the dollar, Dr. Sprague, in his testimony on H. R. 11806 in 1928 before the Banking and Currency Committee, said:

> If the Strong bill will accomplish this result—that is, make the decision in matters of policy at times a little more immediate, and the decision itself a little more definite—then there would be, I think, an advantage from the passage of the bill. I probably agree with you that the defects in the operation of the Federal Reserve System are not so much in positive errors of judgment that have been made but rather in the hesitating manner in which at times policies have been decided upon and then executed.

And thereafter, in March 1929, Dr. Sprague, in an article in American Economic Review, Supplement, said:

> I have reached the conclusion that a stabilization amendment might prove serviceable. * * * A few general principles taken as desirable objectives should neither unduly hamper nor enforce action, and in particular a price stabilization provision in the Reserve Act might well prove helpful in its bearing upon future monetary legislation and in the development of cooperative policies and arrangements with foreign bank officials.

And then Governor Miller, of the Federal Reserve Board, at a joint conference of the chairmen and governors of the Federal Reserve banks on October 25, 1921, declared:

> We should seek just as earnestly to avoid deflation as we should to avoid inflation. By inflation I mean an expansion of credit that eventuates in a rise of general prices. By deflation I mean a restraint of credit that eventuates in a fall of prices. Good economic credit policy will endeavor to steer a middle course between these two dangerous shoals.

Mr. Chairman, the purchasing power of the dollar must be returned to its purchasing power when the great bulk of the debts of this country were contracted, and thereby do justice to the debtors and taxpayers of the country, and in doing so regain our export trade by bringing it in line with the purchasing power of the monetary units of other countries. Then, and not until then, can we compete with them in the markets of the world. It is no processing tax that is causing us to lose our foreign markets, but our exalted dollar. It has been contended, both on this floor and elsewhere, that this country was losing its export trade in cotton as a result of the processing tax.

It so happens that cotton is the one product that we are holding our export trade in. Of the seven crops prior to the crop of 1933–34, the year the tax was applied, we exported on an average only 54 percent of those crops; while we exported 59½ percent of the 1933–34 crop. But the only reason we did was because high-grade spinnable cotton could not be had from elsewhere. The great bulk of the world's cotton outside of this country is produced in Asia which has an abnormally short, coarse, and brittle fiber out of which a very inferior low-grade product can be made, the major part of which goes into carpets and rugs. But they will not take any of our products either finished or raw except as a matter of necessity, and this because of our dollar in the money exchange markets of the world.

Mr. KLEBERG. And I want to say that the gentleman is correct.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. I thank my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas 10 additional minutes.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. I thank the chairman of the committee.

Every country's money is at par in that country, paying 100 percent in taxes, debts, and what not. Since the world depression practically all countries went on a managed currency that revolution might be avoided and justice done between debtor and creditor. France has not, but she has devalued her monetary unit in relation to gold to the vanishing point, as has a number of others. This is the only country that persists in letting its people be robbed and crucified by taxes and debts as the result of the dollar trebling its purchasing power. Not only is our stubbornness in maintaining the dollar at its trebled purchasing power since the depression causing millions to lose their life's savings, wrecking industry and production, while filling the country with hunger and want and unemployment, but it is making it impossible for us to compete in the export markets of the world. Let me give you an illustration, and I will use cotton, as that has so often been referred to, though it will apply equally to any other product whether it be wool, hides, or what not. The pound sterling will exchange for 17 pesos, or Mexican dollars, and with those 17 Mexican dollars the British spinner can pay the Mexican grower 30 cents a pound for his cotton and buy with his pound sterling 57 pounds of cotton in Mexico. Now, when he comes to this country to buy, his pound sterling will exchange for only $4.80, and at 12 cents a pound, he can purchase only 40 pounds of cotton. So the English spinner, after converting into cloth 40 pounds of the cotton he buys with his pound sterling in Mexico, has 17 pounds left which he can convert into American money at 12 cents a pound, or $2.08 with which to jump tariff walls and sell his cloth here. And this applies equally to other products in Mexico and elsewhere.

On the other hand, if a Mexican merchant is in the market to buy from some factory cloth or any other product, if he comes to buy from us he must first exchange his pesos into our money, and we allow him only 28 cents for his peso; while if he buys from the English manufacturer, he can exchange his peso at the rate of 50 cents per peso, and as a result England sells the goods.

Then, again, the New York merchant, seeing he can exchange his money for Japanese money at a ratio of about 3 to 1, finds in terms of United States money he can buy goods made in Japan cheap, while the Japanese manufacturer is paid in his own money which is par in Japan, paying 100-percent taxes, debts, and so forth, and in his money he has received a good price.

This bill provides the means by which the dollar can be restored and maintained in purchasing power to the purchasing power it had covering the period from 1921 to 1929. It provides the levers with which to check and control deflation, first, by enlarging the class of securities that can be rediscounted; second, by the open-market committee buying Government securities, and thereby putting more currency into circulation; third, by reducing the rediscount rate; and, fourth, by decreasing the bank reserves. And in order to check and control inflation the Federal Reserve Board is given the power to reverse these processes—that is, first, by increasing the discount rate; second, by the open-market committee selling Government securities and withdrawing currency from circulation; and, third, by the Board raising the reserves of banks.

So this bill will restore to Congress the power vested in it by the Constitution to make money and to regulate its value by controlling the inflation and deflation of this credit or phantom money, and in so doing stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar, thereby making it a dependable, honest dollar.

Mr. Chairman, under the Constitution the responsibility is placed upon Congress to coin money, to regulate its value, and neither Congress nor its agent which it sets up in this bill to perform that duty for it should permit any outside influences or interferences in the performance of that duty. Therefore I shall offer an amendment at the proper time for the Federal Government to purchase the stock, amounting to about $140,000,000, now owned by some 6,000 member banks in the 12 Federal Reserve banks. The Federal Reserve Board, together with the 12 Federal Reserve banks, is an agency set up by Congress to supply the people with an adequate means of exchange, and to regulate its value, and with no purpose or thought of private gain. While the so-called "member banks" are private institutions, operating for the sole purpose of private gain, and are in no way responsible to furnish the people with an adequate means of exchange, and are concerned alone in making money and paying dividends to their stockholders.

In periods of inflation and rising prices it is always to the interest of these institutions for present gain, and they never look beyond the day after tomorrow to further inflate; while in periods of falling prices and deflation, in their fright they persist in urging further deflation. Under the law as it now is, as well as in this bill, these member banks elect 6 out of 9 directors of each Federal Reserve bank—that is, they elect the 3 class A and the 3 class B directors, while the Federal Reserve Board appoints only the 3 class C directors. In the past this has resulted in friction and cross purposes and is destined to so continue in the future as long as these private banking institutions are permitted to elect two-thirds of the directors in each of the Federal Reserve banks. In this connection I wish to call attention again to that part of the testimony of Mr. Russell C. Leffingwell, where he testified:

> Twelve scattered Federal Reserve banks, each with its governor and its chairman and its board of directors, loosely ruled by a board of eight in Washington composed of men of diverse opinions, do not provide the country with an organization well adapted to act promptly and decisively. Some remedy must be found for this.

On this same point Governor Harrison, of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, testified in 1932 on H. R. 10517:

> It is almost inevitable that the Federal Reserve System or any central bank will always have to be going contrary to what the banks are doing. When they are inflating we have to put pressure on them, and when they are deflating we have to boost them up.

Just so long as two-thirds of the directors in these 12 Federal Reserve banks are the creatures of the member banks there will continue to be such friction and such lack of harmony that the System will not be able to function with the efficiency that it should.

Mr. Chairman, this bill further provides that each Federal Reserve bank shall maintain reserves in gold certificates of not less than 40 percent against its Federal Reserve notes in actual circulation. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment that each Federal Reserve bank shall maintain reserves in gold and silver certificates aggregating not less than 40 percent against its Federal Reserve notes in actual circulation.

I shall also offer an amendment that after the passage of this bill no silver dollars shall be coined. The present silver dollar contains 371¼ grains of pure silver, being coined at a ratio of 15.98 to the gold dollar before it was devalued, and containing 23.22 grains of pure gold. Since the gold dollar has been devalued and now contains only 13.7143 grains of pure gold, it puts the silver dollar with the new gold dollar at a ratio of 27 to 1. I assume it is the purpose of the administration to bring silver back in price so that an ounce of silver will be worth $1.29 at the old ratio of 15.98, which would make the silver dollar now containing 371¼ grains more valuable than the present gold dollar. And as a result, silver dollars would be hoarded and converted into bullion, as it would be worth more in bullion than in the dollar of the present weight and fineness of the silver dollar. Besides, it is folly to go to the expense of mixing the silver with an alloy and coining it when the silver certificate is far more convenient, and then the silver dollar not only loses as a matter of wear and use, but often as a result of fire and other causes. In such a case, the silver is lost to the individual without any gain to the Government, but if the certificate is lost or destroyed, while the individual loses, the Government gains, still having possession of the metal.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is the only remedy that has been brought on this floor which, if enacted into law, will rid the financial heart of this country of a few small, greed-blinded, manipulative groups that have for many years been fattening on the Nation's economic lifeblood. Enact it into law, and it will bring about a sustained, unbroken era of prosperity. Surely every patriot should lay aside petty partisanism in casting his vote on this measure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, I fail to see anything in the pending bill H. R. 7617, to cause any great excitement. It is simply a rehash of the existing Federal Reserve banking laws. It is an international bankers' bill despite the fact some think it is not. It perpetuates the power of issuing the money and credit of this Nation in the hands of the international bankers. Certain amendments will be offered, and I shall be delighted to vote for them and sincerely hope they will be adopted. Even though these amendments are adopted, you will not have very much of a bill, because the control of the monetary system still remains in the international bankers, and it will still be a private bankers' bill.

Having said this much on the bill, let us consider for a minute what is the object and purpose of money and the banks which issue and distribute this money to the people of this Nation. First, what is money? Money is not gold; it is not silver; it is not paper; money is made by law. If you bear this in mind you will never have any difficulty in knowing what money is. It is made by law. It is a yardstick with which we measure the value and facilitate the exchange of goods and services. That is all money ever was and is all money ever will be. The fact remains, however, that there always ought to be enough money with which to do the Nation's business; there always ought to be enough money to meet the obligations of the people of the Nation. For years we have not had enough money with which to do the Nation's business, so we substituted something for money which we called "bank credit"; but that is just hot air; it is not money. We have circulating in this Nation today as basic money in actual use less than $2,500,000,000. There is supposed to be in circulation outside the Treasury $5,400,000,000, but $600,000,000 has been lost and does not exist any more. Notwithstanding this fact, the Treasury Department has never had the decency to make an estimate and tell the American people how much actual money there is in actual circulation.

Over $1,000,000,000 of our money is in foreign banks and is held in foreign countries. Tourists have taken it abroad. If you go into any South American country with an American bank check and seek to cash it you will be asked whether you want American currency or their money. It is estimated that over $1,000,000,000 of our money is in foreign countries. Cuba does practically all her business on our money.

On top of this $2,500,000,000 money structure we have built a superficial structure of hot-air bank money and bank credit without any foundation back of it; and that is the cause of your depression and your panics. When the people realize that for every dollar actually in the banks and trust companies of the United States of America there are $60 outstanding on deposits then is when you have your panics. Then is when you lose confidence in the system, and you ought to lose it; and you ought never to get confidence in that damnable system which has looted the American people for all these years and which has been responsible for hundreds of thousands of suicides, for wreckage and destruction throughout this Nation.

What is the remedy? There is only one remedy. To whom does the money and the credit of the United States of America belong? It belongs to you men and women of this great Nation and not to a few international bankers who use the Federal Reserve bank; it belongs to all of us. Yet, what is the fact? I have in my hand a Federal Reserve note. I am not particularly proud of it. Do you know why? Because it does not belong to me, it belongs to the Government of the United States. But the international bankers took it away from your Government and are using it for nothing, absolutely nothing. This Federal Reserve note is not mine. If I give it to you it is not yours; if you give it to your friend it is not his, because it belongs to the Federal Reserve bank that got it from your Government for nothing; it belongs to the Federal Reserve bank that filched it from the American people. Every minute this Federal Reserve note is in my pocket or in your pocket the American people pay interest on that which belongs to the Government of the United States and that which should be used for the benefit of all the people within the United States. You know that as well as I do. This Federal Reserve note does not belong to me or to the individual that happens to hold it; it belongs to the Federal Reserve bank that got it from the Government of the United States; and all it ever paid for it is seven-tenths of 1 cent per bill.

Now, my friend said he would like to have this bill. Well, it is not mine; therefore, I cannot give it to you. [Laughter.] It belongs to the Federal Reserve bank that got it for nothing.

Now, then, our remedy: There is nothing new in this world, and there is nothing permanent but change. We are in a transition of our civilization, everything is changing. We are going forward from old to new; we are going from an old, corroded, dishonest banking system to a new, and all that we can do to prevent the change will not stop the ultimate outcome that the Government of the United States—no; the people of the United States—are going to take control of their banking and currency system and are going to use it for the benefit of all of the people. Nothing can prevent it, nothing can stop it. You cannot stop the forward movement of the waves of the ocean, neither can you stop the forward movement of our civilization when once the facts are known.

The people are beginning to know what this money system is; therefore it cannot continue. There is nothing new about this money proposition.

Mr. Chairman, in my State we have the Bank of North Dakota owned, operated, and controlled by the people of the State of North Dakota. When that bank was first created they lied so much about it that we have not yet caught up with all the lies. There are filibusters at present against the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, the so-called "utility bill." These filibusters are still lying about the State-owned utilities of my State. They are telling the men and women of the Nation that the Bank of North Dakota has been a failure, that the State-owned mill and elevator in the State of North Dakota is standing still; yet we are running full blast and intend to long after we have passed the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. The utility-holding companies cannot continue to lie about State institutions and get away with it. They certainly do not assist their cause by such methods. The Bank of North Dakota today has resources of $29,103,897.34. It is the only safe and reliable bank in the Northwest. It is as safe as the State of North Dakota, because it is backed by all the resources and the full faith and credit of the State of North Dakota.

May I say that there is not a banker in North Dakota today who will get up and openly and publicly say that the Bank of North Dakota is not the greatest blessing that the State ever had. But for that bank I do not know what we would have done during the drought and all the other misfortunes we have gone through. That bank has saved for the people of North Dakota over $100,000,000 since 1919. It has saved that money to the people of North Dakota and it has been a safe place for the people to keep their funds which otherwise would have been lost. As it was during the depression we lost $60,000,000 in this private banking system that you and I have in every State in the Union. After that all of the treasurers of public institutions put their money in the Bank of North Dakota and that accounts for the $29,000,000 that we have. This money is being used for the benefit of all the people and the profits go to all the people of the State of North Dakota.

Mr. Chairman, why can we not have a bank of the United States like that? I cannot understand why the Banking and Currency Committee never considers anything except the old system. You know the banking bill that we have before us at this time is just a new coat of paint over the corroded, rotten system that we have had heretofore to fool the public. It is just an effort to cover up the corrosion. But you cannot paint over corrosion because the paint will not stick. There is where the trouble is. It has been a corroded system. We are going to get away from it.

What do we propose? I have had before this Congress ever since I became a Member a banking bill modeled after the Bank of North Dakota, modeled after a bank that has been in existence since 1919 and conceded to be one of the finest and safest institutions in the Nation. It is the only banking institution that is owned, operated, and controlled by a sovereign State. I introduced this bill at the opening of the special session and the bill has been before that committee ever since. It is H. R. 3008. This bill would create the Bank of the United States, owned, operated, and controlled by the people of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, under the terms of this bill the people of every State in the Union would elect one bank director. May I ask the gentleman from California whether he is not as much interested in having an elastic currency out there in California as the people in New York? Are not the people of Idaho, Nebraska, Kansas, or Colorado entitled to know how this money business is being handled? Under the bill which I introduced each State would elect one director. The directors would thereupon get together and elect an executive committee of seven, who would keep in touch with the financial business of this Nation. They would run and control this bank.

The bill is similar to the one that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY] introduced, H. R. 6382. Both of these bills have for their object the establishment of a banking system controlled, not by a few individuals nor by one section of the Nation, but by the entire Nation. Under either one of these bills we could take up the $32,000,000,000 of bonds that are outstanding. We would not need any more money in circulation than there is today, but it would be in actual circulation. Give to this bank five or six billion dollars and we can take over every existing bond in the Nation and save the people about $1,000,000,000 in interest each year, and still have enough money to lend for the needs of the States to take up their bonds and for every municipality. We would have enough money with which to do the Nation's work. Every dollar in the bank would be guaranteed, and therefore there would not be hoarding. There would not be the necessity for hoarding, because the full faith and credit of the Nation would be back of the bank notes issued by the Government of the United States.

The question was asked yesterday, "What more is there back of a Federal Reserve note than back of a bond?" Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH answered that there is nothing more back of it, only that you do not need as much money as bonds. Where you would need $32,000,000,000 in bonds, you could actually issue $5,000,000,000 in currency, which would revolve around, and you would have credit equal to $32,000,000,000 in bonds. The difference between money and bonds is that on one the Government pays interest and on the other it does not. It takes about 5 or 10 times as many bonds to do the Nation's business as would be needed in actual currency.

Why do we not pass this bill? The people of the Nation are ready for it. I may say that the farmers of the Nation know more about money and currency these days than the bankers of the Nation. The banker as a rule does not even know what the money is made out of. He just reaches out and grabs it. You cannot find any fault with him, because he is the last man in the world to tell you how to change the system. He is the same as a lawyer, and I am a lawyer myself. A lawyer would be the last men in the world to tell you how to reform the legal system so that you could try your own case. It is not human nature. But the people of the Nation are beginning to wake up. The people of the Nation are demanding a change and they are going to get this change in spite of the dying shadows of a past civilization. We are going to get it. It will take a few years perhaps.

I am in hopes that the Goldsborough amendment may be adopted when we vote on the amendment today or tomorrow. I am also in hopes that the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] will be adopted. But that does not make up a completed bill. When you vote in favor of those amendments it is the beginning of the Government doing its own banking. The bill as written at the present time is as bad as the old one. We pass a banking bill each session, and each one is worse than the one we passed the session before.

Mr. Chairman, there is not any question that money is a medium of exchange. It is made so by your Government. It is made so by law, therefore it must be controlled. There can be too much and there can be too little. There should be just enough money to do the Nation's business properly.

Under the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] we would have a limitation as to the amount of money that should be issued.

Under the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] we would have the control of the money and the credit in the hands of the Federal Government for the benefit of all the people, and that is where it ought to be. Under my bill, or the Sweeney bill, the money and credit of the Nation would be in the hands of the people of the Nation, one director being from each State, and would be used for all the people, the same as it is in the bank of North Dakota, and that is also as it ought to be. All the arguments I have heard against the bank of the United States on this floor I heard before against the bank of North Dakota, but after we enacted it into law and after they got accustomed to it the bankers now would be its best defenders if you tried to change that law, because they know that after all their success depends upon the success of the people of that State, and the same would be true in this Nation.

As far as money is concerned, whatever is back of it is not so important. Some people think you must have gold back of it. There was a time when we had sea shells for money. There was a time when you had mulberry leaves for money. There was a time in our own country when we used tobacco for money. There was a time in our own country when we used whisky for money. There was a time in our own country when different commodities were being used for money, as a medium of exchange. So it does not make any difference what you use as a medium of exchange; it must be, and is always, controlled by the Government, and therefore money is made by law.

It does not make any difference what is back of this piece of paper. I prefer the credit of the entire United States to the credit of a few individuals. I prefer the credit of the Government of the United States, all of it, back of its currency rather than gold or silver. Of course, there ought to be a safe and sane control of it, and this you have under the Goldsborough amendment.

Again may I state that something has been said on this floor about honest money and dishonest money. We have a dishonest money system. I say that under that system in 1917 you got $1.89 for a bushel of wheat in Minneapolis. At that time 1,000 bushels of wheat would have bought $1,890 of money, and then in 1932, in October, it took just 19,000 bushels of wheat to buy the same number of dollars as 1,000 bushels would have bought in 1917. Such a system is not honest. It is not fair to the people of this country. It has done nothing but bring wreckage and destruction, and then we build it up again on false hopes. We increase the bank money and credit, and down she comes again—the people finally lose confidence in the money base. If you have this money issued by the Government of the United States and controlled by it under proper regulation, you never could have that kind of fluctuation. You never could have the wreckage that has been brought about under the system we have today.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the Members for their attention. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, we have listened today to various statements on this bill. I am going to confine my remarks chiefly to title II, for the reason that I believe it is the vital title of this bill and without it the bill would be of no value to the people of the United States, for it is a long step in the direction of placing the banking system of the Nation under effective control of a board directly responsible to the people through their elected representatives in Congress.

One group of our more adventurous friends propose complete abolition at one step of our privately owned banking system. Another group, equally daring, would have us tie our monetary system, as distinguished from our banking system, to a commodity index, thus giving us what is known as a "commodity dollar."

Of the first proposal, I have only this to say: I believe such a revolutionary step at this time might so shock our economic structure as to delay recovery for a number of years. Of the second proposal, it is my firm belief that we would be stepping out of the frying pan into the fire.

Most of us realize that many banks have failed to guard the public interest and the interest of their depositors in the use of the banking power. This is partly due to short-sighted greed and partly to weakness in the banking laws.

It is clear that radical changes in the law are essential. Such changes should place the Government in control and direction of money and credit.

This bill establishes such governmental control and direction as seems essential to make the banking system serve all the people instead of a small inside group.

It is being loudly bruited about the country by a subservient press and parroted on the floor of the House by honest but misguided members of the minority that title II of the bill is designed to give the administration "political" control of the money and credit of the people.

WE RETURN TO THE CONSTITUTION

This is not true. What this bill aims to accomplish is to give back to Congress its constitutional function to "coin money and regulate the value thereof." This function was long ago surrendered to the privately owned banks and has been tenaciously held by them to the detriment of the people. This bill restores to Congress this function, which is once again to be vested where the Constitution rightfully places it.

Prior to the creation of the Federal Reserve System, the responsibility for the monetary and credit policies of the Nation was in the hands of a powerful group of New York banks. The reserves of the entire Nation, through the correspondent system then in vogue, were in the hands of this powerful group. This gave a few men a death grip on the whole Nation. For it enabled them to dictate the credit policy for industry, commerce, and agriculture. It was the ideal system for predatory manipulation. It opened the way for those periodical shake-downs of the middle class, politely called cycles of depression. In the old days we called them panics.

LOBBYING IN 1913

It was this Money Trust, which President Wilson so clearly described in his New Freedom, which made apparent the necessity for the Federal Reserve System. The system was created by the Congress in 1913. That this new instrumentality for the orderly direction and control of money and credit failed to cure all of the evils of the older system is due primarily to the success of the powerful banking lobby when the bill was before Congress. In spite of President Wilson's great leadership, drastic changes were made in the bill, and the act just fell short of accomplishing what President Wilson and the Congress had in mind. Let us here and now determine that no lobby of special interests shall cause us to compromise and weaken this bill.

One of the shortcomings of the act was that it left in the hands of the Federal Reserve banks the control of open-market operations, one of the most powerful of the levers for the control of monetary and credit policy. The bill before us seeks to remedy this defect by placing the control of open-market operations in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board. Thus the refusal of one Federal Reserve bank cannot check the carrying out promptly of such operations when they are needed to stabilize prices and credit.

FALSE CHANGES PREVALENT

I might say here that I do not believe the western bankers are opposed to this bill. In fact, some of the leading bankers of the West that I have talked with are in favor of it.

Because the control is to be centered in Washington, where it can be promptly employed to effectuate a national monetary and credit policy, the disgruntled banking group, chiefly centered in New York, is now crying to high heaven that this is "political" control. At the head of these comes Mr. Warburg with the red herring of communism.

Since the Constitution specifically gives Congress the right to coin money and to regulate the value thereof, why is it subversive of the American system to exercise that right?

Of course, it is neither communistic nor radical. It is merely common sense for the Congress to decide at last to exercise its constitutional powers over money. If there is any one function of Government more clearly set forth in the Constitution than this, will the objecting gentlemen please indicate it?

Let us consider a little more definitely what kind of control this bill proposes.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL VITAL

It is Government control over money and credit by the Congress through the Federal Reserve Board, which is itself the creation of the Congress. Through the operation of the Banking Act of 1935, if we pass this bill as now written after 8 weeks of hard work on the part of the committee, the control of the Nation's money and credit will be just where it always should have been—in public hands. Check money, which constitutes 90 percent of all the money that passes current in the course of the Nation's business, will be retained as it is; but it will be so safeguarded that any attempt on the part of a little group of powerful bankers to blow up a balloon of inflation, similar to that released during the fateful period of 1922–29, will be promptly checked. This checking can be accomplished by the Federal Reserve Board through the operation of three major levers of control, namely, those over open-market operations, over the discount rate, and over reserve requirements.

Another provision of the bill that is giving the die-hards among the bankers cold shivers is the making of the term of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board coincide with the wishes of the Chief Executive. This is being attacked as though it were treasonable. Yet the people elect the President and hold him responsible for the execution of the monetary and credit policy of the Nation. What more logical than that he be authorized to have at the head of the Board governing monetary and credit policy a man in whom he has confidence and who will, naturally, shape his course in such a way as to enable the Chief Executive to carry out the mandate of the whole people who elected him to do their will?

I might say right here that the chief weakness of the whole Federal Reserve System is that it has been manipulated by the New York group, not in the interest of the Nation as a whole but in the interest of that well-known group of unscrupulous men who have proven to be as incompetent as they are greedy.

THE PUBLIC INTEREST PROTECTED

I have said that it is the purpose of the bill to make the banking system serve all the people, instead of a special group strategically placed. This is accomplished by reorganizing the Federal Reserve Board and by placing in its hands the full authority for ordering and carrying on open-market operations. Thus we are creating a sure implement for the stabilization of prices and credit.

It is recognized that open-market operations are essential to the stabilizing of money and credit. It is also recognized that such operations to be effective must be promptly decided upon and vigorously executed. Under the present system neither prompt decision nor vigorous action is possible. The open-market committee, representing the 12 regional Federal Reserve banks, has the duty of deciding when open-market operations are advisable. But the Federal Reserve Board has no authority to force action unless the 12 regional banks agree to cooperate. One bank can block action.

The bill before us changes all this and changes it in the public interest. It places the authority for ordering open-market operations in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, which is authorized to conduct such operations when it decides that they are in the public interest. No longer can a single bank or group of interested banks block action.

PRICE STABILIZATION

In assuming its constitutional powers over money the Congress has gone a step further, it has in this measure, through a direct mandate to the Federal Reserve Board, included credit in its powers. Since money and credit are, under our system, almost if not quite synonymous, the Congress has given the Board the following mandate:

> It shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise such powers as it possesses in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to business stability and to mitigate by its influence unstabilized fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action and credit administration.

The purpose of this mandate is, insofar as it is possible by monetary action, to establish a stable price level and give to the Nation a dollar that will have a uniform debt-paying, tax-paying, and commodity-purchasing power.

One of the activities that did more to wreck our commercial banking system than anything else was the mania for loans on securities, on the mistaken idea that that type of loan was more liquid than the regular short-term commercial, industrial, or agricultural paper.

One of the most important phases of this matter is the rapid decline of commercial paper between 1925 and 1929, the reason for this being that the great commercial and industrial corporations were induced by the investment bankers to sell securities in the form of preferred and common stocks, or in the form of long-term bonds or shorter-term debentures.

In this way these giant enterprises were freed from the need of short-term commercial loans. Instead of having to go to the bank at intervals for their current needs, they sold vast blocks of securities and became, instead of borrowers, lenders in competition with the commercial banks, many of which invested in the securities of their former customers or loaned freely on these securities.

REAL-ESTATE LOANS

We are told that one of the dangers of this bill is its provisions governing real-estate-mortgage loans.

Those who see danger in this provision are, I think, laboring under the impression that real-estate loans were at the bottom of our banking trouble because of their lack of liquidity.

The banks of the Nation are broadly divided into country banks and city banks, regardless of whether they are National or State banks.

Up to 1925 the loans of country banks were principally commercial paper. However, between June 1925 and December 1928 the volume of commercial loans in country banks declined $300,000,000, from $5,209,000,000 to $4,979,000,000. While this decline was in progress these same banks increased their loans on stocks, bonds, and other securities $714,000,000, from $1,586,000,000 to $2,282,000,000. Thus we see a decline of over a quarter of a billion in liquid commercial paper and an increase of three-quarters of a billion in paper secured by domestic stocks and bonds and an investment by these banks of $429,000,000 in foreign securities.

During this same period farm-real-estate loans declined $75,000,000, while loans on other real estate increased only about $350,000,000.

It would, therefore, appear that three factors other than real estate operated to weaken the country banks: first, the decline of liquid commercial paper eligible for rediscount; second, the increase of paper secured by stocks and bonds and not eligible for rediscount; and third, the investment of $429,000,000 of their funds in foreign securities, while their real-estate loans remained at about normal.

REDISCOUNT PRIVILEGE

It was the lack of eligible paper that caused most of our banking troubles. Had the provision in the bill before us, making all sound assets available for discount at the Federal Reserve banks, been part of the existing Federal Reserve Act, the drastic deflation of 1929–33 could have been cushioned. For we all know that had the banks been able to go to their Federal Reserve bank and get the needed currency to meet the rush of withdrawals, the runs would have stopped, and such banks as were in a weakened condition could have been quietly strengthened, fear would have vanished, and the bank holiday avoided.

It is true that the Emergency Act of 1933 did accomplish this in part. It was not, however, broad enough, and it was not resorted to until most of the damage was done.

Had the previous administration been alive to its responsibilities to the whole people, instead of frantically trying to save the skins of its big-business friends, the whole Nation would not have been subjected to the deflation with its misery, loss, and hopeless despair that followed the stock-market debacle of 1929.

I have confined my discussion of this bill to the controversial title II. But I wish to mention with satisfaction the first title which makes permanent the insurance of bank deposits up to $5,000 for each depositor. This is in itself a great achievement. Its soundness is proven by the success of the temporary insurance of bank deposits.

In this connection I wish to pay a tribute to the Honorable J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency, for his able, impartial, and effective handling of the rehabilitation of the banks that were not in a position to open immediately after the bank holiday. His effective participation and direction in the difficult task of rebuilding the capital structures of these banks and thus making them eligible for deposit insurance is a notable contribution to national recovery. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, it has been my observation that in discussing the banking industry it is a very easy matter for us to talk in terms of "banks and bankers" and to forget the fact that the tool—money—which the banks work with, originates through our individual citizens making deposits in the banks. When I refer to the term "money" in this respect I, of course, include check money and credit money as well as currency and coins. In other words, the raw material which the banks work with consists of the deposits which you and I and the other people who do business with banks deposit in those banks. In a great majority of cases we make that deposit subject "to call" or with the thought thoroughly in mind that we may make a withdrawal "on demand." Saying it another way, business is carried on largely through deposits thus made. On the whole, we do have a large amount of time deposits, but that portion of our check or credit money cannot be used as freely by the owner as the "demand deposits." Therefore, insofar as production of factory goods, the employment of people, and the production and transportation of agricultural goods are all concerned, I think it is entirely sound to say that demand deposits are a real motivating force for these operations. The man who places his money in the safety-deposit box or in time deposits does so with the full intent of not using that portion of his financial strength in the promotion of the production and exchange of the commodities of life—this being true, of course, only so long as the money is deposited in the safety box or in the form of time deposits. It is not for the depositor to know what the banker will do with the time deposits, because he, through his action, is willing that that portion of the Nation's financial strength shall remain idle and out of production. It is easy to visualize a situation wherein time deposits will draw no interest or even will not be accepted.

I notice a statement in the morning paper which says:

> The 19 members of the New York Clearing House Association no longer will pay one-fourth of 1 percent in interest on time deposits which are payable within 6 months from the date of deposit, and after May 15 they will stop paying the same rate on the demand or time deposits of savings banks in commercial banks.
> The United States Treasury recently hired money on a short-term basis equal to one hundred and fifty-three thousandths of 1 percent annual interest, and bankers' acceptances for 30 to 90 days are quoted on a basis of from three-sixteenths to one-eighth of 1 percent interest, all highly safe loans for a short period of time.

Only yesterday the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina made the observation that he was very liberal-minded and that he favored the necessary laws which would enable some banking power to force the banks in times of emergency to take the bonds of the Government. I see no liberal thought in this expression. Let us assume for a moment such a law was passed authorizing the Federal Reserve Board or some other authority to do that very thing. What happens when the authority is exercised, whether by degree or completely? As a depositor, I would visualize the operation of such a plan in this manner:

In the course of life I make a demand deposit as a result of the sale of 100 hogs, or 1,000 head of cattle, or from the receipt of wages or salaries or dividends or interest on an investment in a factory I operate. I do so with the full thought in mind that within a day or month I may withdraw that money for the furtherance of additional production involving the employment of people. However, as a result of the banks being forced in time of emergency to take the credit which I had on the bank's books and buy therewith Government bonds—thus putting the bank in a nonliquid position—I find the demand for payment made by myself and associates and neighbors cannot be met. Accordingly I must decrease production on my farm, close my plant, increase unemployment, and decrease my own purchasing power. My personal and industrial operations are seriously interfered with—perhaps entirely destroyed—and this same case duplicated millions of times will bring about a paralysis and dislocation in our productive and exchange activities of far-reaching consequences, resulting in a depression. I wonder if the gentleman gave serious thought to his statement before making it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as an American citizen with income and property that can be taxed, never would I object to the Federal power saying to me in times of emergency and country-wide distress that it is coming to me to take, through the power of taxation, a large or a small share of my income and property, to the end that I pay my proportionate share of relieving less fortunate people from the predicament in which they find themselves as a result of the emergency. As a member of organized society, under a constitutional form of Government, I could not justify a protest against such action by my Government.

However, if that same government goes to the bank or banks in which I have previously deposited my savings, and income from sales or otherwise, and without first giving me a chance to make my withdrawal, forces that bank to invest my savings or credits or deposits in Government obligations in such a manner as will prevent the bank meeting my demand of withdrawal, then I shall protest. I shall protest for many reasons:

First. I expect to use those deposits for purchasing goods.

Second. I expect to use those deposits for creating goods.

Third. I expect to use those deposits for the employment of other people.

Fourth. I expect to use those deposits for the meeting of obligations for which I previously pledged myself.

Fifth. I expect to be able to use those deposits for many purposes and without having previously given notice and then awaiting the bank placing itself in a liquid position with the consequent loss which usually follows.

From the statement made by the gentleman, he would have the banks of the Nation first finance Government, instead of taking the money deposited therein by the people, and let it be used first in rendering service to the people through acting as the financial fountain for the carrying on of enterprise by individuals and corporations. If it is the purpose of this bill to make banks first the financial agent of governmental activities instead of being the financial agent of industry, then that becomes overwhelming. That procedure will change the institutions of America. Such a proposal is very fundamental and calls for the most serious deliberation, debate, and understanding of our people before it becomes the law of the land. To create a power, from which no appeal can be made, that can (at any time an emergency is declared, whether justified or not), concentrate the buying power belonging to our people and represented by deposits in banks, into interest-bearing obligations of our Government, and all without the consent or even knowledge of the people owning the deposits—is a power that goes entirely too far. It is a power which I do not believe the American people are in a frame of mind to accept. They have been told the banks which closed during the past 15 years were closed because they were not liquid and could not pay the depositors' withdrawal demands. Our people know enough interest-bearing bonds will be issued without this additional encouragement. It will be most difficult for anyone to justify such a course as sound banking, or as one necessary in this day and age. Such a course will help destroy what confidence our people now have in banking.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I wish to go on record in a most emphatic manner as being opposed to the continuance of a policy which leaves in the hands of a few private bankers the social and economic welfare of our people. Down through the years we have been victims of the "rigging and manipulation" of this method of control. Just as emphatically do I wish to go on record against a plan which resolves itself into the form of a political control of the banks, insofar as their open-market policy, interest or discount rates, and reserve balances required are concerned. As between control through and by private bankers, or through politics I am forced to frankly say (and without having experienced the effect of political control) control by the former may be less harmful than by the latter. This is one matter in which I prefer to transcend experience in the reaching of my conclusion. At the present time it would be difficult for one to convince me that our banking system can, through political control, be so regulated and adapted that it may become a more efficient instrument for the promotion of business stability and the mitigation of industrial fluctuations. Nor do I favor the continuation of the "heyday of laissez faire." It is my sincere belief that booms and collapses will continue to recur under political control the same as under private banking control. At the same time I am of the opinion that if our banking system is left to itself with no conscious effort of control it will tend to intensify rather than to counteract business fluctuations.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman please define political control?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very shortly I shall clear that up, and I think answer it to the gentleman's satisfaction. The controlling body should be one which represents the interests of the Nation as a whole and not one that acts solely in the interest of a particular economic or political class, or group of people. The purpose of a nation, as expressed in its constitution, and the political, social, and economic philosophy of its people, can be completely nullified by any given class, private or political, who controls the money supply.

Furthermore, I am convinced the bankers of this country are very much in favor of a nonpolitical control which will assist our banking system in rendering that service which our people must have, keeping in mind at all times the necessity of dealing with each case on its merits and providing for local control or national control, whichever is in the public interest.

The density of population and the concentration of manufacturing, speculation, banking, and transportation in and about New York City and in the vicinity of the northeastern Atlantic seaboard may bring about banking problems dissimilar to those which simultaneously exist on the Gulf coast or in the Middle West or on the Pacific coast. For this reason I cannot, without further information and deliberation, bring myself into agreement with the provisions of section 12 (c), lines 22 to 25, page 52, and lines 1 to 10, page 53. By reason of the preponderance of banking weight in the vicinity of the New York Federal Reserve Bank district, its requirements from time to time, its desire to speculate in commodities and securities and production, or its desire to not do so, it appears to me it will be highly destructive to other major districts to be forced to follow an open-market policy which will accommodate the situation in the vicinity of New York but may not at all accommodate the situation in Chicago, Kansas City, or San Francisco. Additional information might clear up this question to some degree, but at the moment it does not appear at all equitable.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the Federal Reserve Board has, at any time, exercised its power to force all the Federal Reserve banks to act in unison insofar as the rediscount rate is concerned? If the Board has never exercised this power, is it reasonable to assume that it will in the future? If it has been found that the Board should not so exercise its power and that such an exercise would be detrimental to one or more districts, why should not that power be now taken away from the Board?

I notice the chairman of the committee is not present at the moment, and I am just wondering whether any other member of the committee would care to answer that question.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. They did in the summer of 1929, and I am sure they also did it in May 1920. Those are the only instances that I can remember distinctly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is rumored, and I have had it on very good authority, that the governor of the New York bank came to Washington and tried to induce the Federal Reserve Board to arrange their rediscount rate sufficiently to discourage speculation in stocks and bonds, and it was generally conceded that if the Federal Reserve Board had at that time exercised certain prerogatives given to them under the act and had raised the rediscount rate, the crash would, at least, have been cushioned, and there has been much comment among bankers and economists upon the failure of the Federal Reserve Board to act and act promptly at that time. They have never had the authority to force the Federal Reserve banks to abide by their recommendations.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I gladly yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. STEAGALL. It should be said in that connection that the rediscount rate has ceased to be the major power that could be used by the Federal Reserve Board. In the original bill that was the outstanding power that the Board might exercise, and it was placed in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, but it developed later on that by far the larger powers of the System were lodged in the open-market operations, so that as a matter of fact there was no power in the Federal Reserve Board to deal adequately with that situation.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. In order to clarify my previous statement, the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] is entirely correct, and the Federal Reserve Board did later attempt to stop speculation on the New York Stock Exchange by raising the discount rates and they did raise them, as I previously stated, but they raised them too late.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And may I ask if at that time all of the Reserve banks throughout the Union were forced to act in unison in that increase in the rate?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That is correct.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is my understanding that the Federal Reserve Board had not the power to compel adherence among the Federal Reserve banks on any policy it might adopt with reference to the rediscount rate and open-market operations, open-market operations in particular.

Mr. STEAGALL. Did the gentleman say they did have the power?

Mr. WOLCOTT. That they did not.

Mr. STEAGALL. But they did have the power as to the discount.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I did not make the statement that they undertook to require the Federal Reserve banks to either buy or sell Government bonds.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan permit me to ask a question of a member of the committee?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Has there been any table or statement put in the RECORD or the hearings or is any available showing the magnitude and the amount of the open-market operations under the Federal Reserve System? It seems to be stressed as the chief power under this bill, and I think it might be informative if there is any history available of the exercise of that power up to this time, which could be put into the RECORD.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Does the gentleman desire me to answer that question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to have the gentleman answer that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. From 1924 to 1928, under the leadership of Governor Strong of New York, the Federal Reserve banks bought and sold Government bonds in an endeavor to stabilize the price level. We were trying to enact legislation for that purpose. I talked with Governor Strong about it, and he said while he would not advocate the legislation, he advocated the policy, and he carried it out very successfully until his death. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It does not throw much light on the volume of business under this power. That is what I would like to know.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. In the spring of 1932, in an effort to defeat the Goldsborough bill, the Federal Reserve banks purchased, first, twenty-five million a week and then they went up to a hundred million a week, and as soon as they had succeeded in defeating the Goldsborough bill in the Senate they ceased to buy Government bonds. I will say to the gentleman from Colorado that the chief lever in the bill is not the open-market operations. The chief lever is the power that the Federal Reserve Board will have to change the reserve requirements of the member banks.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. If the gentleman will yield, I think I can answer the question specifically.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I happen to have the Federal Reserve Bulletin for April. The amount of Government bonds now held by the combined Federal Reserve banks is $2,437,000,000.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I did not understand that to be the gentleman's question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That was my question. I do not want to take the gentleman's time, but I will appreciate it if there is any more information to the same effect, or any table that could be put into the RECORD, going to show the probable importance and effect of this power in the bill.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Did the gentleman say $2,700,000,000?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Two billion four hundred and seventy million of Government bonds in the combined Federal Reserve banks; not the member banks, but the Federal Reserve banks. The other item of open-market operations consists of the purchase of eligible paper amounting to $7,600,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Federal Reserve Board can, at will, change the requirements as to reserves to be maintained against demand or time deposits, or both, by member banks in Reserve or central Reserve cities, or by all member banks, I believe that it is conceivable that banks may be in more serious difficulty in the future than in 1931 and 1932. The apprehension which now exists in the mind of the banker with reference to liquidity insofar as demand-deposit withdrawals are concerned may easily be continued through the fear of the banker as to how much his reserve requirements may be manipulated up or down by the Feedral Reserve Board. The entire control here proposed will no doubt bring into operation a most delicate situation. Time alone will have to answer as to the beneficial effectiveness of the political and other powers here proposed.

With reference to the amendment to section 13, page 53, line 15, I should like to have some member of the committee comment on the percentage which a member bank will likely be able to borrow on mortgage paper as compared to that available when Government bonds are used as collateral. If the public generally are in a frame of mind which causes it to "run away" from real-estate paper, will not that cause the Federal Reserve powers to look less favorably on collateral of this nature as well as to enforce more stringent maturity dates on such loans?

How far afield does the philosophy of "soundness" take us versus the philosophy of "liquidity"? Is it not true that we shall, if we accept the philosophy, have to build an entirely new bank-performance structure? When the public do not want a specified type of investment, is there any soundness to its value? Is not market value a "state of mind" of the investor? Perhaps we shall have to re-create our conception of what constitutes soundness when used in banking terminology.

No bank can be more liquid than the maturity of the paper it holds. I believe it can be stated that no banking system can ultimately be more liquid than its entire holdings. Feeling this way about the situation, I am much inclined to believe that we shall have to eventually segregate commercial banking away from that of long-term or even short-term mortgage financing.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. I would like to ask a question without any intent to embarrass. I have heard a great deal stated on the floor regarding the political domination of the banking system. Does the gentleman mean by that that if the Government has direct contact and direct control of the Federal Reserve System, that should be interpreted as political domination or political interference?

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the gentleman will let me finish my statement, he will have somewhat of a rough definition of what I mean by "political control."

Demand deposits must be available on call, or else the depositor's plans are destroyed and his operations crippled, all of which leads to unemployment and stagnation of business generally. If the proposed plan is one that makes "demand deposits" at all times available to the owner thereof, and at the same time corrects the banking system to the end that city homes and farms will at all times be eligible as a basis for financing along with other assets, thereby maintaining a reasonable and fair market value for the farms and city homes of our Nation, then I feel that will be a long step in the right direction. If the proposal is short of this, I am sure it will not bring the benefits our people so sorely need.

On page 6740 of the RECORD the gentleman from North Carolina made this observation:

> But I say to you that there must always be in this country a close working arrangement between the authority controlling money and the man whom the people have elected to provide for the protection and to direct their social and economic welfare; and you cannot effectively direct the social and economic welfare of a nation like ours without being able to, within proper limitations, influence the monetary policies.

POLITICAL CONTROL

A futile effort was made by Congress to prescribe formulae for the application of the gigantic public-works fund. What Congress cannot subject to a rule of action, it cannot lawfully delegate; but that is secondary. What is fundamental is that as to matters more important in their direct effect and necessary implication than have come before any President since the time of Washington, the determination of policy delegated to the President must be, in turn, delegated to others, and whoever happens to be acting for the President at the time is committing this Nation and its business. To control the proportion of so-called "reserve deposits" of any class which member banks may be required to carry with the Federal Reserve bank is, of course, final power of life and death over the functions of any and all banks. To dictate to any Reserve bank whether it shall or shall not purchase bonds of the United States is far-reaching. Since the determination of the Reserve ratio may draw into the Reserve banks any or all of the deposits of the System, the Board may thus call all deposit assets of the entire banking system of the United States to support the market for or be invested directly in United States securities. There is no appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Now, I have no doubt that American business considers those undefined and uncharted powers excessive for an administration committee to social and economic reconstruction and unwilling to define the term.

I am informed that what is known in history as the "Biddle panic of 1833" was directly caused by the action of Biddle on August 1 in ordering a contraction of credit by the Bank of the United States in order to convince the public in the November election that the bank's continued existence was necessary.

The able Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Eccles, asserts that these powers are essential to the release or freezing of deposit credit and currency to meet the requirements of sound business. The theory of a currency thus controlled by one man may be better than the theory of decentralized control underlying the Reserve System, but, with the demonstrated faults of the old system in 1929, they are subject to correction without conferring upon an agency of Government the ability to accomplish an economic coup d'etat in the nationalization of capital or in furthering social reconstruction. I point out that Governor Eccles' statement as to the combination of the power to manipulate credit with the taxing power to affect the distribution of income raises basic questions at the outset. Mark you, his thought, as expressed, contemplated the exertion of the power of taxation to affect or influence a better distribution of income.

Now, referring to page 241 of the hearings, Governor Eccles made this statement:

> But so long as there is an inequitable distribution of wealth production which results in excessive saving we will have depressions. Only by pulling back that part of our savings that we cannot profitably use in new capital goods and using those funds to give employment to those who become unemployed can we maintain a balance.
> The Government must be the compensatory agent in our economy through the money system, through the tax system, and through a public-works system.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Governor Eccles also made the very interesting statement, which I think was correct, that the income of one-tenth of 1 percent of the people at the top was as great as the 42 percent at the bottom.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What I meant by "political control", taking what I have already stated and adding to it, is this, that if our banking system and our taxing system is to be controlled by any particular administration, if it be this administration or some other administration, whether it be Democratic or Republican, to the point that administration may engineer our entire activities in such manner as to force public works, and may further make political voters dependent upon that public-works program for their bread and butter, I must say that is a very bad method of control for a banking system. From the statements of the Governor, as set forth in the hearings and the control provisions which this bill carries, I am led to the conclusion that one of the prime objects of the proposed legislation is to acquire political control of this nature. I believe it is possible for us to so manage and direct our industrial activities with respect to monetary policies, production, distribution, and exchange as will permit all of our people to be engaged in active industry and be independent of public-works programs administered by either political party. If we can no longer be independent of political control I must say we are in a sorry mess. I do not believe that politically controlled monetary policies and public-works programs, as set forth in the testimony and this bill, to be sound under the institutions under which I have been brought up, and I do not believe our people will ever be satisfied with such a program. Our people want work with private industry and to be free and independent of any kind of direct political party control, and they want their private industry to be just as free in every respect whether it be manufacturing, banking, or farming.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the getleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. The gentleman understands that the question of a public-works program, after all, cannot be brought into contact with the banking business of the Government, without special legislation in this chamber and in the chamber at the other end of the Capitol. In other words, a public-works program must be authorized by the Congress. It stands to reason that in connection with any such program, if the effectiveness is dependent upon the banking system, the banking system must necessarily be brought into harmony with the general plan, or else the Government is put at a disadvantage.

I want to point out to the gentleman, because I realize he is of the same opinion that I am as far as the general good of the country is concerned, that the banking system has been able to go off on a tangent and do just about as it pleased.

Heretofore the banking system has been able to do just about as it pleased. In my opinion the time has come when the Government must of necessity take some control over the banking system, call it political or by any other name. Is it not better to have the banking system under the control of the Government than to permit the bankers to manipulate the banking system to their own advantage and to the disadvantage of the people?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, answering the gentleman from Michigan, I for one do not believe that it is necessary to leave the control of monetary policies and the creation of money in the hands of private bankers or to place it under political control, as here defined. I do not believe the Supreme Court of the United States is controlled politically or that it ever has been. I believe in, and am in favor of, creating a monetary commission just as independent of any administration or political control as is the Supreme Court of the United States independent of political control. I would have this monetary commission operate under the jurisdiction of Congress, carrying out the directions, desires, and wishes of the Congress of the United States as it may speak from time to time. To it should be delegated the necessary power to act as the supreme monetary authority under the direction of Congress, all as set forth in the Constitution. To state how matters pertaining to the banking activities of our country shall be handled for the advantage of the people as a whole and without domination by any political party or any political administration.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would like to make the observation that during the gentleman's discussion there was made what, to my mind, is the most significant disclosure that has been made throughout this entire debate, and I have listened to it very attentively.

It was made once before in this debate. It is that during the great speculative orgy in Wall Street, the greatest in the history of the world and the thing which to my mind was directly responsible for the panic, an effort was made by a Federal Reserve bank, or by some bankers, to get the Federal Reserve Board to raise the discount rate so as to check that orgy of speculation, but the Federal Reserve Board refused to do this.

It is my opinion that the refusal of the Federal Reserve Board to act in that crisis was due to its subservience to the very interests that were propagandizing for and profiting by that orgy. Despite the advice of the bankers these private influences were powerful enough to influence the great Federal Reserve Board to refuse to take the necessary step to control the situation. In my judgment the greatest danger in the powers conferred on the Reserve Board in this bill is that there may come about a reversion to the character of administration we had in this country at that time, when we would have the same identical result and this system would be converted into an engine of exploitation just as it was before.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is practically impossible, if not utterly impossible, for any Chief Executive to go along without being materially influenced by his leaders all about him. This applies to industrial, military, and political leadership. The wise men who drafted our Constitution fully realized that fact. When the Supreme Court was created this fact was recognized. Politics make strange bedfellows. I appreciate the observation made by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct a few remarks to a proposition of which I have been a sincere advocate for nearly 10 years. In fact, I believe that in my section, the South, I was the first to bring it to the front and propose it as a national policy. I refer to the insurance of bank deposits through a corporation of the Federal Government. And I may say that I believe in all sincerity that the reassurance this has given the people in their financial institutions has done more to pave the way to recovery than any one single act of the new deal.

This is a proposition, Mr. Chairman, which is legislation for the people. When the new deal came into being it was not the answer to a mere 2- or 3-year condition. It was the result of more than a decade of gradual slipping away from confidence in the business facilities of our country. Throughout that period which our Republican friends were designating as the most prosperous times America ever had enjoyed, our banks were steadily steering their courses toward failure. Their depositors were encouraged by the word "national" in their names, and "member of the Federal Reserve" on their windows. But there was no definite security for their funds.

And may I remind you, Mr. Chairman, that during this time—the years of Coolidge, Hoover, and Mellon—banks were actually failing and depositors were losing their money. They were not only losing their savings, they were also losing their facility for conducting business in their communities. It was like having their tools taken away from them so they could not earn a living by their work. As an example, back in 1926 there were failures of more than 60 banks in Georgia in one single day. Please allow your imagination to suggest how many thousands this affected. Is it any wonder a depression followed?

I need not recall to your mind the panicked condition of our people in the spring of 1933. They had put their faith in their banks, yet they did not know but that most of their funds would be lost to them. Naturally they rushed to their banks to get their money out, and naturally, too, there followed the shortage of cash and throttling of credit which made closing all the banks necessary.

The new deal's answer to this condition was the creation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which was at first established as a temporary means of restoring public confidence in the banking structure. Through it all deposits up to $2,500 were insured against loss. In the law authorizing the extension of the Corporation's life, passed last year, the amount of insurance was increased to $5,000. The effect of it was immediate. Money came back out of trunks and stockings and mattresses and returned to the banks, where it could work to rebuild the business of our communities. We now propose to guard against any possible repetition of the 1933 calamity by making the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation a permanent institution.

The assessment for insurance is only one-eighth of 1 percent, and this certainly is not a burden on the banks, in view of the fact that the people are bringing their money out of hiding and placing it in banks.

I know my conservative friends will tell you that the first job of a depositor in a bank is to determine the integrity of the banker. I know they will tell you that the convenience the banks offer in the handling of their funds is given as compensation for the risk they take in making deposits. But I will tell you this: That the American people think their banks ought to be places where they can put their money without having to worry about it, and if you are going to continue to let those signs saying "national" and "member of the Federal Reserve" be placed outside their doors you have got to guarantee the people that your banks will not lose their money for them.

Federal deposit insurance is a comparatively new development. It may be said to be still in the experimental stage. But the record of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation is already one of notable achievement. Out of the chaos and confusion of 1933 has come an organization which, by restoring the confidence of depositors in banking institutions, probably forestalled the utter ruin of our financial system.

In place of the trepidation and uncertainty of 2 years ago, depositors of over 14,200 banks can now rest secure in the knowledge that their savings are protected by Federal deposit insurance. They know that despite any untoward economic development or despite the occasional dishonesty of trusted individuals their funds are safe. They know that if their banks were forced to close tomorrow, within 10 days representatives of the Corporation will have settled their claims against that bank and given them their money.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation is not an institution of charity. It is as much a business proposition as banking itself. Its function is not merely to pay losses in the event insured banks are forced to close. Even more important is its obligation to forestall such losses by building up and supporting its member institutions.

During the 18 months' experience of this Corporation one fact has become increasingly evident: That is the necessity of granting the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation the right to supervise its risks. Certainly such a right would not be denied any insurance corporation.

The liability of the Corporation is estimated to be well in excess of $17,000,000,000. To protect itself against this liability and to insure the ultimate success of deposit insurance, I feel that the Corporation must be granted three supervisory powers, all of which are embodied in the bill now before us for consideration. The first is the power to refuse to admit fundamentally unsound banks to the insurance fund; the second is the power to regulate, by means of examinations, banks which have been admitted; and the third is the power to liquidate insured banks which become insolvent. The Corporation must be operated on a sound basis.

None of us could expect to be approved as a risk by a life-insurance company after suffering a first or second paralytic stroke or after the inroads of cancer had made it evident that we had not long to live. By the same token we cannot ask that the Deposit Insurance Corporation be required to admit to the benefits of membership all banks which might apply. The applicants must come in a healthy condition. It has been proven again and again that hundreds of the banks which are licensed every year in this country are doomed to short lives. Since the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has no authority to regulate the chartering of banks, it certainly should not be forced to jeopardize its fund and the banking system at large by granting the benefits of insurance to banks which cannot hope to develop a business which will assure sufficient earnings to cover expenses and losses.

Equally as important as the right to select its membership should be the Corporation's right to supervise the conduct of its members' activities by means of periodic examinations. The constructive results of a thorough examination constitute the best single instrument by which the Corporation can reduce loss from bank failures.

The detection and control of unsound and dangerous practices of bank management can be accomplished only by the intelligent use of the examination, and this supervisory instrument is equally valuable in its application to sound and well-managed banks, banks bordering on insolvency, and banks which have already become insolvent and should be closed before a depletion of asset values further increases the Corporation's liability.

As a result of the examinations which it has made already, the Corporation has been able to improve the condition of thousands of its members. A program of cooperation has been developed which has made it possible for many banks to continue operations when, without aid, they would certainly have failed.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Fund is a mutual undertaking. Through it, over 90 percent of the country's banks are now united in one Nation-wide system. These banks have a very tangible interest in the sound operation of the fund, and it is to their mutual advantage that they be required to meet uniform, rigid standards of examination and to be able to benefit from the intelligent and constructive criticism which is now made available through the joint efforts of the Corporation, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Federal Reserve Board.

Of major importance is the right of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to act as receiver of insured banks which are forced to suspend. This right was recognized by the Congress in that provision of the Banking Act of 1933 which required that the Comptroller of the Currency appoint the Corporation receiver of every insured national bank which closed.

The Corporation was also authorized to act as receiver or liquidating agent of insured State banks in the event it was so appointed by the State authority having charge of liquidation.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I was impressed with the statement made by the gentleman to the effect that in 1926, a prosperous year, 60 banks in his State were closed. Am I correct?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. More than 60 banks failed in 1 day in 1926 in my State.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. In 1926 we were having prosperity. The gentleman, of course, feels sorry for the depositors that we did not at that time have the bank deposit guaranty law. Does not the fact that 60 banks failed in the gentleman's State in 1 day in 1926 show how weak the banking system was at that time?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. The gentleman must realize, of course, that in my section of the country cotton is the main money crop. When the price of cotton went from 40 cents to 10 cents per pound in 1920, of course, the banks weakened. They carried their customers year after year, until many of the banks were forced to close. The depression began in our section in the fall of 1920 when, within the space of 2 months, the price of cotton went from 40 cents to 10 cents per pound.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I take it the banks in the gentleman's State lent most of their money to cotton growers.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Loans were made to cotton producers and business men.

On December 31, 1934, insured banks reported total deposits of $39,000,000,000. Under the present maximum limit of insurance, 94 percent of insured banks have 70 percent or more of their deposit liabilities fully covered. More than 43 percent of the deposits of all insured banks are protected. So you see that in an overwhelming majority of cases if the Corporation were forced to pay out the insured deposits of these banks it would become by far the largest creditor.

It is a well-established principle of law that the first voice in conducting a liquidation should be granted to those creditors primarily interested in the outcome of the liquidation. Bankruptcy law specifically provides that the liquidation of the assets of the estates of bankrupts shall be accomplished through a trustee elected by a majority in number and amount of the bankrupt's creditors. In view of the tremendous size and patent priority of the Corporation's investment in closed insured banks, it must certainly be privileged to supervise the liquidation of their assets.

Granted these three safeguards, I feel sure that the Corporation will continue its record of notable achievement. Federal deposit insurance is a permanent thing. Federal deposit insurance properly conceived and conducted is undoubtedly the best available means of protecting our people from a repetition of the disaster which overtook them so recently. The establishment of a sound banking system is second in importance only to the maintenance of the soundness of that system, and it is for such maintenance that I appeal.

I am glad to say this bill seeks to induce nonmember State banks to join the Federal Reserve System but does not in any way attempt to force the banks to join the System. [Applause.]

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I believe it was Napoleon who said to his secretary, Menval, when they were in a tight place:

> Give me three things and I will end the dominion of England and establish the continental system.
> What are those three things?—
> Asked Menval—
> They are money, money, money.

Mr. Chairman, when we sit here for 2 or 3 days listening to a discussion of money, what it is, how you make it, how you can get it, how you pay your debts, and so on, we cannot help recalling the remarkable career of Frederick the Great, who took Silesia from Maria Theresa and then fought 7 years against the combined armies of Europe and wound up without owing a dollar. He paid as he went, or, as we say today, he went on a " cash and carry " basis.

I call attention to a situation in the history of America which is most amazing, and which few people believe when first they hear it, but my authority for the statement are records from the Library of Congress.

We talk about the resources of the American people. It will be recalled that after the Revolutionary War we did not have a dollar in gold. We owed everybody we could owe. We were prostrate financially; but, of course, there was patriotism here, and that was the spirit that had developed during the 175 years from Jamestown to the Revolutionary War. There we were, poverty-stricken.

Now, let us take into consideration what happened from 1787, after the adoption of the Constitution, up to the time of Andrew Jackson in 1837. There was a great recovery from the low level of financial status of this country in 50 years. Those old fellows knew something about financing. They did something on this Capitol Hill that the whole combined crowd, multiplied by 5 or 6, today have been unable to explain or accomplish. This is what they did: They had so much money in excess of the needs of government in those 50 years that they had to divide it among the 26 States at that time.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place this statement in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. This is something that may call for an examination into the history of your country, and instead of plunging ahead and reaching out into dreams and drifting things, go back to these old men like Andrew Jackson who had something to do with this sort of thing or at least could produce results.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that historians like Beard give credit for that period of prosperity at the commencement of this Government for 25 years to the great war in Europe when Napoleon led his soldiers from Egypt to Moscow?

Mr. FOCHT. The country did not get any of it from Napoleon, for Napoleon was eclipsed in 1815, or more than 20 years before the date I have mentioned, 1837.

Mr. PIERCE. They got it because of the war over there.

Mr. FOCHT. No; we never got anything from him. What did he pay us with? True, we bought Louisiana from him, but could have had little commerce with him for all that time England's fleets swept the seas.

Mr. PIERCE. It was paid in our bonds and the things we had over there.

Mr. FOCHT. In other words, the gentleman wants a war over in Europe, but we do not want to be dumb enough to get into the affair ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

MEMORANDUM

DIVISION OF BIBLIOGRAPHY,

From William Belmont Parker's The Life and Public Services of Justin Smith Morrill (Boston and New York, Houghton Mifflin Co., 1924, 378 pp.), pages 109–110, we quote the following:

"It was the 10th of May when Morrill's bill passed the House, but months were to elapse and great events were to intervene before it became law: the revolutionary election of 1860 which placed the Republicans in power and revealed North and South in utter division; the actual beginnings of secession, and the withdrawal of southern Members from the Senate, all came to pass before the measure was accepted in the other Chamber and received Buchanan's signature on March 2, 1861."

Respectfully submitted.

FLORENCE S. HELLMAN,
Acting Chief Bibliographer.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I want to get to just one other point. The one thing we are all overlooking is the thing that made the country rich, great, and strong. We have a tradition here that somehow we cannot break loose from. It seems to hang to us. Every great man in the South before the Civil War was a protectionist, and you will find that proof written in every declaration made by Jefferson and others in their papers and documents. I have not gone to the trouble and I do not care to go to the trouble of boring you with a long written story and extracts, but that was the position of those men. The evidence of this great story is in the Library.

Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest men America ever produced, and he was a Democrat, a Member of the United States Senate, Minister to Russia, Minister to England, Secretary of State, and President of the United States, 3 days before the expiration of his term signed the greatest tariff bill that was ever written—the Morrill tariff bill. You were just as much protectionists down South as we were up North or out West until it was decided that the South would go out. Then it was proper indeed if they thought they were going to get away, and be a raw-material producing country, that they incorporate in the Confederate Constitution, section 1, article VIII, that at no time should there be any such thing as tariff, excepting for revenue only. The word "protection" was not used. So that today I can readily see how the South held to that tradition but should now abandon the idea as to what they were going to have in the Confederacy, because there is no Confederacy, and the South is not a strictly raw-material producing section, and we have broken down under the decision of Justice John Marshall every barrier between the States.

Mr. Chairman, it is the free flow of trade between the States that makes us rich and strong. It is this trade between the 48 States or nations, and there is where you are abandoning the real power of the sovereignty of States. The States gave to the Federal Government what power it has, and what power it did not give it reserved for itself. You gentlemen of southern tradition understand that better than I do; and yet you are going to abandon that in this kind of a bill and let one man be a dictator. Somebody back there knew better than we do how to accumulate money and pay our debts to recover from the depression incident to the Revolutionary War. The South apparently was for free trade, which was because of the Confederacy; but there is no Confederacy. So the North, South, East, and West all should understand that we are rich because we have no barriers between the States; and we need never despair of that power and liberty if we adhere to the Constitution written by the fathers.

In conclusion I herewith add the article in the Confederate constitution relating to the tariff. Article 1, section 8, of the Confederate constitution gives congress the power—

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for revenue necessary to pay the debts, provide for the common defense, and carry on the government of the Confederate States; but no bounties shall be granted from the treasury, nor shall any duties or any taxes on importations from foreign nations be held to promote or further any branch of industry.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not claim to be an expert on banking and that is why I have sat here during this debate to listen to the great men who have preceded me in the exposition and illumination of this great, fundamental law we are now considering. I want to learn, as I think this is the most important piece of legislation we have had anything to do with in this session of Congress, and I do not believe that during this session of Congress we will have legislation of any more importance to consider.

I have listened to the debate, as I have said, upon both sides of the Chamber. On the side to my left there has been a great deal said about the political control of the Federal Reserve System. This does not bother me very much. As I have listened to the debate and as I have considered this piece of legislation, it seems to me that, after all, the powers we are extending to the President under this bill are rather negative powers; in this sense there is much discretion, of course, given to the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks, and this must necessarily be so. You have to give the people who administer our banking system discretion, and it seems to me that the President will only come into the picture when extraordinary conditions are prevailing in the country or when he has a suspicion that these discretionary powers may not be exercised in the interest of all the people of the United States.

So if I am right about this, and if I am not right about it I invite the committee to correct me, I am not so much concerned about that proposition. I think probably it will work out beneficially, and if we had this power in the last 5 or 6 years I doubt whether we would have had nearly as many bank losses in the United States as we have had. We would have had bank losses, I know, but I doubt very much if we would have had them to the extent that we have.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Does the gentleman approve that part of the bill which enlarges the eligibility of member-bank paper for rediscount.

Mr. FIESINGER. I was coming to that. To me that is the serious part of this bill, and I am having a great struggle with myself to come to the point where I can support this bill upon that proposition. I like to go along with a committee which has given great study to a measure and I do not like to set up my independent judgment, which is rather hastily arrived at in this case, but I want to give you the reasons I am in the state of mind I find myself.

In the first place, it seems to me if you are going to let the Federal Reserve Board say, without any more definition than you have in this bill, that they may discount upon any sound asset, you have destroyed by such power the central idea back of the Federal Reserve System, and that is liquidity. If you fill up these banks with assets that are not liquid, when you come to a period of emergency and you are frozen, then I do not know what would happen. This is the great difficulty I see in this bill.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. Has the gentleman any doubt about liquidity when their assets are Government bonds, which they can turn into currency?

Mr. FIESINGER. Well, I am doubtful about that. I do not like to say it, but I am doubtful about it.

Mr. PIERCE. They have that power, have they not?

Mr. FIESINGER. I think they have.

Mr. PIERCE. And they can turn their bonds into currency.

Mr. FIESINGER. Let me qualify what I have said a little bit. The Federal Reserve banks have had these powers, and I think we gave them practically all of these powers as emergency powers, did we not?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. If they had had these powers during the period of strain and stress, I doubt whether this depression would have been as deep as it is.

I am perfectly willing to give the Federal Reserve banks these powers in an emergency, but I doubt the wisdom of making them permanent. An emergency is the time when you need liquidity, when the bank foundations are shaking, and if you tie up the reserves when there is not an emergency, then you may not have liquidity when you most need it in an emergency.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. The bankers at the present time have $2,000,000,000 in excess reserve. That means $20,000,000,000 issued without going to the Reserve banks. This is not for the present hour but for such time as you may need it, when we have such conditions as we had in 1929.

Mr. FIESINGER. I have heard that idea expressed a good many times. But the gentleman is not looking at the whole picture. He is looking at the picture from standpoint of the present, he is not looking at it for 10, 15, or 20 years to come.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Does not the gentleman think that as long as the banks are allowed to operate and as long as our money is created by debt—in other words, as long as we have our present system—we have got to have some place for it, call it the Federal Reserve Board or not—where money can be artificially created?

Mr. FIESINGER. I would not expect, of course, to call Congress into session every time we had an emergency. I think the power must be placed somewhere, but I would have it reside in the Federal Reserve Board, in connection with the President, to be used only in case of emergency. I think these are fine powers; but, as I stated a while ago, I do not think so much of them—I am afraid of them as permanent policy except when emergency exists.

Mr. PIERCE. What harm can they do; they are only for an emergency?

Mr. FIESINGER. Oh, we are changing the very fundamentals of eligibility. Heretofore the limits of eligibility have been well known. In my judgment, there is no real definition of eligibility in this bill.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. As far as eligibility is concerned, in the present law we are confined to three things—agricultural, commercial, and industrial paper, with a few exceptions. That class of paper has dwindled to almost nothing, and therefore there is no liquid paper.

Mr. FIESINGER. I want to say this—I have some strange views, that is, strange to you, perhaps—I say that we ought to have paper in abundance, and the right kind of paper, as we could always have in the Federal Reserve if we had the proper system of basic money.

Mr. FORD of California. It is the system that is wrong.

Mr. FIESINGER. I agree with that.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not want the statement to go unchallenged that there is no such paper. The fact is at the present time there is roughly $7,000,000 of that paper in the Federal Reserve.

Mr. FIESINGER. I did not say that there was not any.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The fact is there are so few loans that the banks are willing to take at the present time that the banks themselves are holding that paper and not turning it over to the Federal Reserve, and that is the reason why the amount is so small as $7,000,000.

Mr. FIESINGER. Comparatively it is small, but there is paper of that kind.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Most of that paper is held by the member banks themselves, and they do not want to turn it over because they want the interest that is paid upon it.

Mr. FORD of California. Does the gentleman realize that that paper was declining in 1929 and that there was a definite reason for it?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Absolutely; but I do not want the Congress to think there is only $7,000,000 of that, and that is all there is in the Federal Reserve bank.

Mr. FIESINGER. Could the gentleman give me any light on what that amounted to in 1929?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think I could find it for the gentleman rather readily.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If we could go back to the industrial activity comparable to 1929, with a national income of $80,000,000,000 to $90,000,000,000, does the gentleman believe that at that time there would come back into existence a great amount of the paper of the nature that is now being discussed as having disappeared.

Mr. FIESINGER. There would have to be. You could not have that amount of income without having paper commensurate with that volume of business.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If that be the case—and I have watched these comments here with a great deal of interest with reference to the disappearance of that paper as well as the comments of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board—wherein is there any virtue in an argument at this time that paper of that nature has disappeared? It seems to me there are many reasons why it should.

Mr. FIESINGER. It certainly has disappeared. That is a fact.

Mr. FORD of California. I can tell the gentleman why.

Mr. FIESINGER. I think if we ever get this thing straightened out, it will reappear, but the fact is that it has disappeared.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then if it will reappear in our industrial activity, the money now on deposit will be withdrawn and, perhaps, a little more credit money created, and it seems to me that will be a natural recurrence and that this paper of the nature referred to will come back into existence and will be here as before.

Mr. FIESINGER. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. KENNEY. There is no real open market for that paper, is there, in competition with banks?

Mr. FIESINGER. Does the gentleman mean at the present time?

Mr. KENNEY. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. Oh, I take it that there are open-market operations on that outside of banks. I do not think it is entirely extinct. I am not informed on that, but I would say that you would find that kind of paper in New York today.

Mr. FORD of California. The gentleman is in some doubt as to why it disappeared. I can tell the gentleman in a few words. From 1923 on the investment banker went into the market in this way. He went to the manufacturer and the great corporations that had been going to the banks and giving 90-day paper and said, here, "We will sell stocks and bonds for you and then you will have your capital requirements all prepared, and you will not have to go back to the banks every 6 months or every 3 months and have to get money in great volume", and one-third of the money that was used in stock speculation on the New York market was listed "For account of others", and that came from the great corporations that had sold their stocks and bonds and got this money. That made them not only no longer customers of the banks but competitors of the banks for that kind of paper, because they themselves bought whatever was in the market. That situation has not been corrected, and I see no reason why it should be corrected, because if they can get their money in that way they will not go and borrow it on 90-day paper.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The Federal Reserve Bulletin that I have in hand goes back as far as March 1931, when the total amount of commercial paper in the hands of member banks of the Federal Reserve was only $361,000,000. Today it is only $232,000,000. So there has been a material decline, as the gentleman has indicated, from 1931 down to the present time.

Mr. FIESINGER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Does the gentleman know how much is outstanding in member banks, as indicated by the open market?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. It would be impossible to tell from this copy of the Federal Reserve Bulletin. I can say that the amount of brokers' loans in the hands of member banks in 1931 was $1,600,000,000, and in December of this year about half that much, or $800,000,000.

Mr. KENNEY. I am talking about commercial paper.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Well, I gave both.

Mr. FIESINGER. I know the able members of this committee have labored intelligently and they have labored a long time to bring out this piece of legislation. I think, however, that this House has got some notions as to what the results of this legislation are going to be, and that they are really going to be disappointed. I refer to two things: First, I think that the Members of this House think that this piece of legislation somehow, in some way, is going to open up the banks of this country to commerce and industry. I do not believe that is going to be the result.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Well, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I hope the gentleman does not mean to indicate that any member of the committee has expressed that opinion?

Mr. FIESINGER. No; I did not claim that. The second point is this: I think I know how this House feels on this point. This House has expressed itself at least twice and perhaps more times, but I remember twice distinctly, that if we are going to cure this depression we have got to raise the commodity-price level to the debt level. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER] has expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield the gentleman from Ohio 5 additional minutes.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. It is either that or repudiation?

Mr. FIESINGER. Absolutely. Members of this House are going to be disappointed in that proposition. This piece of legislation, contrary to what has been said upon the floor of this House upon that proposition, will not do anything of the kind. I say to you that the provision in this bill that has been referred to in this debate more perhaps than any other provision in the bill is merely, as I have thought, a little sugar water to make the castor oil not taste so bad. I know how my good friend the gentleman from Maryland feels upon that proposition, and he feels deeply, just as I do. I know what he wants. I have been in this House for almost 5 years, and I have heard practically all of the gentleman's speeches. I have talked to him privately. I know what his thoughts are upon this subject, but he is not going to accomplish it, in my judgment, even though we may put into this bill the Goldsborough amendment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Does the gentleman think that the amendment which I will offer will improve the bill?

Mr. FIESINGER. Well, that is something I have been worried about a great deal. Perhaps I am old-fashioned and not a liberal; a liberal in these days is one who consistently disregards all previous experience; but I have gone hurriedly over the testimony of at least two governors of the Federal Reserve Board and the governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, who have spoken upon this question. The thing probably to do is to say, "Well, they are working for selfish interests, banking interests"; yet I do not just look at it that way. I am taking into consideration when those men speak before committees of Congress, that they are trying to give to the Congress and the country the best that they know how to give. At least, I am going to stop, look, and listen to what they say.

Now, this bill does not regulate the value of money. I have heard men get up here and rant and rave that this bill is going to take us back to the Constitution. It will do nothing of the kind. This bill will not regulate, and the powers conferred under this bill will not regulate the value of money.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Did the gentleman intend to return to the Goldsborough amendment?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes. I intended to refer to that. I would like to give you the reason why I consider the testimony of those great administrators of the Federal Reserve Act. I will advert to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Ohio 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. As I understand, the Goldsborough amendment seeks to reestablish the commodity-price level and it also establishes a free open market for gold and silver. I admit there are not any mechanics in it, but the objectives in it, it seems to me, are in harmony with the ideas of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point three paragraphs of a letter that I wrote to the Attorney General of the United States while the gold-clause cases were pending in the Supreme Court.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FIESINGER. I call your attention to the wording of the Constitution:

> Congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coins.

Congress can coin money only by the process of fixing upon an agreed weight and fineness; the stamp placed upon the coin being in the nature of a certification of "weight and fineness", as provided by law. By this process you "fix" the weight of coins. Only by another process can you "regulate" value.

Clearly, coining money is a process of fixation whereby weight and fineness are fixed. Regulating the value thereof is a separate function, which must be and can only be done in full recognition of the inevitable and inexorable force of economic law.

NO REGULATION LAW EVER ENACTED

It is a striking fact that the Congress has never enacted any law in compliance with this provision of the Constitution.

After fixing the weight of the coin, when we leave the value of the metal therein to fluctuate, we not only fail to regulate the value of the coined money, but we increase the instability of paper money and bank credits, which are measured by the coin as a unit of value. We must recognize that collateral back of paper money is changed in value if the value of the coin is allowed to fluctuate. The stability of our paper money and of our whole credit structure is involved in our neglect to regulate the value of the metal contained in the coin.

Now, to get back to the Goldsborough amendment, and the reason I say it will not operate and what was in the minds of these great administrators of the Federal Reserve law: What the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] and I would like to see done is to raise the purchasing value of prime commodities—that is what we are interested in—wheat, corn, tobacco, and all those things mother nature gives us out of the ground, whose prices, whose values, if we have an exportable surplus, are not fixed in the United States but are fixed in the markets of the world; and I do not care how you operate under this law, you cannot affect the market in Liverpool or any other great world market.

Mr. PIERCE. How would the gentleman do it?

Mr. FIESINGER. How would I do it? Instead of devaluing the dollar I would take the extremely high purchasing power out of gold by bringing into competition with gold a gold equivalent; and I would break down the value of gold, I would break the world corner on gold and would thereby raise the value of the prime commodities not only in the United States but everywhere in the world.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Silver?

Mr. FIESINGER. When I say "gold equivalent", what else could it be? Silver is a part of the basic money of the world. I would give silver legal-tender qualities for its world accepted value, thereby making it everywhere in the world auxiliary gold. I would restore the monetary base of the world by using it as a gold equivalent, and thereby reduce the purchasing power of gold that it had in 1926 in terms of commodities. I would thus cure the world of the gold disease, which is the cause of stagnation of world trade. I would give the world an adequate supply of sound money, and this Congress is the only power that can give the world an adequate supply of sound money, and if we do not do it, I fear the whole structure of civilization will topple, as a result of wars that are bound to come, if we do not lift the oppressor gold from the backs of the people. Democracy is fast perishing from the earth, and if we do not cure this thing, governments of the people, for the people, and by the people will exist only in history. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I cannot give you an academic presentation in reference to the provisions of this bill. I have been in Congress 3 years, and, during this period, I have had continually dinned in my ears such words as "acceptances, debentures, 90-day acceptances, sight drafts", and similar other terms pertaining to banking. Very little, however, have I heard in reference to legislation which, in my opinion, would bring about national recovery.

I am going to speak briefly in reference to another form of sight draft, the sight draft of the millions of unemployed who are given insignificant food orders through the emergency agencies. These food orders include no fresh meat and so little variety that the diet they impose on the recipients is far from a balanced one. It is in respect to these people, our unfortunate worthy unemployed and the part-time employed, that I rise this afternoon to discuss this bill.

Visualize, if you can, the millions of unemployed, the millions of partially employed, the aged, innocent victims of the depression, and especially the youth of our country, tragically handicapped through lack of opportunity, and then consider the provisions of this bill, which, if properly amended, would, I believe, bring recovery to our Nation.

I know that the Committee on Banking and Currency includes in its membership some of the brightest men in Congress—in fact, in the United States. The Membership of the Congress should be proud to include such distinguished individuals as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS], and the Committee on Banking and Currency is fortunate indeed, in my opinion, in numbering these two gentlemen among its members. My only regret is that the viewpoints of these unusually well-informed and distinguished gentlemen have not been incorporated in this bill.

Before proceeding further I wish to state that if this bill, as obnoxious as it is, is amended to include the Goldsborough amendment, I shall vote for it. Without the Goldsborough amendment, or a similar provision, expressing a clear mandate from the Congress, I shall oppose it. I am not in favor of delegating the constitutional prerogatives of the Congress to the President or to any other individual.

I have great confidence in the Membership of this House. In my opinion, the Seventy-fourth Congress includes more able men than did the Seventy-third. I believe it is probable, although as yet it has not been positively demonstrated, that there is more courage and independence in this Congress than there was in the Seventy-third. I am confident that every one of you is personally well disposed toward dealing with our economic problems in a straightforward and courageous manner, but unfortunately, collectively, when the votes are taken, too often these commendable traits are not in evidence. I fear that the thought of reelection and the benefits of privilege and patronage actuate too many of us in what we do on this floor and in how we cast our votes. It is indeed deplorable that courage and independence of thought and action cannot be more confidently claimed as assets of this Congress.

THE DEMOCRATIC DONKEY

Speaking as a Democrat, I recognize the emblem of our party as the donkey and, in the past, the rooster. May I recall to the minds of the Members the pictorial advertising of a well-known product which has a particular significance for us in our present status in the Congress? I refer here to borax.

When borax was discovered in the West there was no means of transportation other than by wagon. I am confident all of us remember the packages of borax which bore on the carton a picture of a 20-mule jerk-line team hauling borax. If you observed the equipment you noticed that the 20 mules drawing the wagonload of borax were handled by a single jerk line.

This picture may be said to personify the weakness of the present Congress. Its committees are apparently controlled by a single jerk line. Then what do we do collectively? Too many Democratic mules walk sedately in line, just as though they had no minds of their own, guided and controlled, as the most of us are, by a jerk line running from the White House to the Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HOEPPEL. For a brief question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I merely wanted to observe that the 20-mule team managed by one jerk line delivered the load.

Mr. HOEPPEL. It certainly did, because the driver handling the jerk line knew exactly where he was going. Does the President and those who are with him know where we are going? If the gentleman will look into the relief program, consider the millions on relief and the millions more who are on the verge of resorting to relief under our present inordinate spending program, it will be apparent to him, I believe, that we are traveling to a solution of our problems with about the same speed which characterized the antiquated mule team. Our vehicle of state will be so overloaded with debt that only repudiation, inflation, or confiscation will permit our future progress. As representatives of the people, knowing these facts, we ought to exercise our independence and vote and act in accordance with our own intelligence and the impulses of our hearts. We should vote and act as we honestly and sincerely believe. The majority of you will admit, I believe, that you are not doing this in many instances.

If we would only exercise the prerogative of a donkey, if we would only become balky once in a while, we would get somewhere with legislation. We merely plod along, following the lead of the jerk line which may be in the hands of the President or perhaps manipulated by others prominent in new-deal policies, including the Secretary of the Treasury, whom I recognize as the mouthpiece of the international banker. We are as docile and complacent as a superannuated ox or a petted house kitten!

I believe too many of us are being controlled by an administration jerk line. Personally, I shall not be influenced by a jerk line from the White House or from any other source, but I will respond, and am endeavoring to respond, to the jerk line of my own conscience in the interest of the people whom I represent and the American people generally who have suffered 5 years of depression. I can see little hope ahead, however, under the plans we have thus far outlined.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman is for the American people, he is going right along the same line with the President in the White House, because if there ever was an occupant of that White House who was for the American people, we have one there now.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I do not deny that the President is honest and sincere, but it is my opinion that he does not now see the "forgotten man." I think he is getting his information from the wrong sources. If he would do less driving and more confiding in the Congress, and leave us free to legislate according to our constitutional prerogatives, with due consideration to conditions as we know them to exist in our own districts, I am confident that the Congress would enact legislation which would be of more benefit to our distressed people than that which we have enacted, much of which was written and sponsored by those surrounding our President, in the Cabinet, and elsewhere. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER], who preceded me, has suggested legislation which would contribute materially toward recovery.

Mr. BLANTON. The President is conferring with the Members of this House every day.

Mr. HOEPPEL. With whom is he conferring?

Mr. BLANTON. He is conferring with the leaders—your party leaders and my party leaders. There must be party leaders in every Congress.

Mr. HOEPPEL. He is conferring with leaders who have been here 10, 20, or 30 years, and, with all due respect to these fine gentlemen, it is my opinion that they do not appreciate and understand, as we younger Members of Congress do, the desperate plight of our people.

Mr. BLANTON. I am one of the younger Members of Congress, and I am willing to work, cooperate with, and follow my party leaders here on all vital administration matters. A Congress without party leaders is not worth much. What, for instance, would the Republicans do without the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]? They would be like a rowboat on the ocean without oars.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I cannot yield further to the gentleman from Texas, although he is my good personal friend, and I consider him one of the leading and most efficient Representatives in this Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman for his kind observation.

Mr. HOEPPEL. What we need is something we have never exercised. We need the courage to stand on our own feet here and act in accordance with the dictates of our own consciences, understanding, and intelligence. I am not taking instructions from any source but my own people back home. From the standpoint of education, many of you are far superior to me.

OUR LEGISLATION FAVORS BANKERS RATHER THAN PEOPLE

You are readily conversant with banking terms, such as "debentures, acceptances, sight drafts, 90-day paper", and so forth. I know little about those things, but I do know the problems of the common people. I can get down to the very grass roots of the sufferings of our people, and if our leaders would do the same thing we would have banking legislation which would be much better than the measure now under discussion.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield one more time, because we are good friends?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. When has there ever been before a President in the White House who has caused an old-age pension to be passed? He caused one to be passed. When has there been one before so interested in the welfare and problems of the people to cause a social securities bill to be passed? He has done so. Why these innuendos and indirect reflections upon our great President, when, I am sure, the gentleman does not mean it?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that I sat on this side of the aisle when the President read his speech in reference to economic security on June 8, 1934, and I thought then that he would be, indeed a savior to the people if he carried out this program; that he would go down in history as second to George Washington. But what has he presented to us?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, what is the old-age security bill? It is a monstrosity. It is bait to the aged citizens of this Nation. No Member here will claim that this bill will become effective within a period of 1 or 2 years, and then the pensions will be inadequate. Many thousands and hundreds of thousands of the worthy, aged citizens who had hopes in the administration social security program will have passed on before the pauper pension bill takes effect.

Mr. Chairman, I am interested in relief now, not tomorrow.

Answering the gentleman from Texas further, may I say that I am convinced that the President is well disposed. I recognize that he is a remarkable man, but, in my opinion, with his eyes on the too-distant future, he fails to realize the urgency of our immediate needs and is predicating our recovery upon a patched-up old order rather than upon the establishment of a new. It will be recalled that Germany, in the seventeenth century, engaged in what was known as the "30-year war."

Perhaps the administration will get us out of the depression under a 30-year program, but what about our aged citizens and the suffering of our people now?

Mr. BLANTON. Our friend the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL] should do as I have done. I have written to members of our Texas Legislature asking them to pass an old-age pension bill to meet the requirements of our bill. I wrote to the Governor, to the Lieutenant Governor, and to the speaker of the house in Texas, sending them copies of our old-age-pension bill. I called attention to the fact that it was necessary for our State legislature to meet the provisions of the bill. If the gentleman will have his California Legislature do that, and if our legislature will do that, when the United States Senate passes that bill and it is signed, it will go into effect and the aged people in our States will receive the benefits within a very short time.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, if the Congress would exercise its legislative prerogatives, actuated by an earnest desire to alleviate the distress of our people and to solve their economic problems, we could, I believe, immediately enact the Goldsborough banking bill or the Cross bill, through which we would save the taxpayers billions of dollars per year. Then we could pay a substantial pension to the aged of our country without forcing the impoverished States to tax their citizens in order to pay a share of the inadequate pauper's old-age pension, as is proposed in the security bill. We could then give them a pension instead of a promise!

I am also in favor of the Sweeney banking bill. I am convinced that there is no chance of getting out of the depression, permanently, regardless of the spending of billions of dollars, until we correct the monetary situation. We should not put the control of the finances in the hands of the President. It should be in the hands of elected representatives of the people, who are subject to recall, as is provided in the Sweeney bill.

Furthermore, why should we take the credit of the United States, which is your credit and mine, and turn it over to the private bankers through the privately owned Federal Reserve System, and permit them to lend our own money back to us at interest? No one can justify such procedure, and this is one thing which we ought to correct in the bill under consideration. If any profit is to accrue to anyone from the extension of Government credit, certainly such profits should go to the United States Treasury rather than to the international banker and the banking ring.

There is some talk about a third party. I hope the Progressives in our party will force the enactment of proper liberal and progressive legislation at this session. If we fail to do this, those of us who wish to save our party will want to be sure that in the next Democratic platform there is written a provision for real monetary control by the people and for the people rather than by the private banker and for the private banker. We do not wish the control of our banks to be in the hands of Morgan and Mellon or others of the banking crowd; neither do we wish it to be solely in the hands of the President. No one individual is infallible. I have no regard for Barney Baruch nor for "Windy Crackdown" Johnson. Who knows but perhaps they may get their fingers on the administration jerk line, if we enact the bill under discussion without mandatory restrictive provisions?

Mr. BLANTON. I hope my friend will not yoke up with the one they are after.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I do not quite understand that.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will never get into any "hooey" bandwagon.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I will answer my good friend from Texas by stating that I am not following any one person or group of persons, but I am endeavoring to uphold our party and our party platform and keep faith with those who sent me here to represent their best interests. I do want our party and our platform to be liberal and progressive. I believe we should live up to the platform of our party and to its ideals, but unfortunately we seem to have lost sight of the noble principles and policies enunciated in our platform of 1932. I do not propose a third party. I am convinced that we have a sufficient number of liberals and progressives in our own party to carry the banner forward. If, however, we fail to enact progressive legislation in this session in the people's interest, or if we fail to embody sound economic reform in our platform of 1936, a third party may possibly develop, as, in my opinion, the problem of monetary control and the right of Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof will be the paramount issues in 1936. I believe this is inevitable.

We are in the midst of a political revolution. I do not know whether all of you realize this or not, but some of you should go back home to your districts, meet your people, and remain with them from adjournment of the Congress until it reconvenes in January, next, and thus gain a sympathetic understanding of their viewpoints and the actual conditions confronting them. I fear that too many of our Congressmen have not spent sufficient time in their districts in the past 2 years to realize the desperate plight of their constituents. How can a Member understand the problems of the people he represents if he spends only a few weeks in his district a year and gains his knowledge of conditions largely from the press and from his political supporters? I know the problems of the people of my district for I am in daily personal contact with them during the time Congress is not in session, and my activities here in their behalf are based on my actual knowledge of their suffering and distress (which is paralleled in every district in these United States), and the imperative necessity for meeting their need through the enactment of basic-relief legislation if we are to avert ultimate disaster.

I agree with the President in his pronouncements in reference to the international stabilization of currency and the commodity dollar. It is for this reason that I favor the Goldsborough amendment to this bill which I would like to see every Member of this House support. If, however, we would break the jerk line entirely, which appears to reach back into Wall Street, and enact into law a modified Goldsborough, Cross, and Sweeney banking bill, I am confident the depression would be over within 6 months and there would be absolutely no reason for the wasteful expenditure of public funds at a wage scale below the prevailing wage rate. Why should an unfortunate, worthy unemployed citizen be discriminated against in public employment, as is provided in the work-relief bill?

TARIFF PROVISIONS TO PROTECT AGRICULTURE NECESSARY

I believe in adequate tariff protection to American agriculture and industry; and we Democrats, especially the gentlemen from the South, must wake up to the fact that the tariff is a very vital question to us here in America. It is my belief that the tariff on commodities and materials which we can produce in abundance in the United States should be adequate to protect our home producers against foreign competition in our markets, or we should have a direct embargo. In California, for instance, we have poultrymen in the bread lines who are being subsisted on Government funds because our tariff rates are so low that the Chinese are sending eggs over here and putting our poultry raisers out of business. Is this a sane or sensible policy? Certainly not. We ought to put up tariff barriers against the products of the cheap labor of Europe and the Orient which come in over our tariff walls. Because of the depreciated value of the currencies of other nations they are in a position to pay our existing tariff rates and import their products into the United States, thereby reducing the demand for our domestic products and resulting in curtailment of our production, with corresponding increases in the numbers of our unemployed.

The tariff rates of nations with depreciated currencies are reduced, in a sense, in proportion to the depreciation of their moneys. In other words, foreign nations are undercutting our tariff rates because their currency is of less value than ours.

This is a condition which affects us vitally and one that I think should be corrected at once. I have introduced a bill to provide that wherever the American dollar is at a premium in a foreign nation, exports from such nations shall have added to the existing tariff rates the percent of increase in rates which represents the advantage enjoyed by such nations, due to the difference in value of their money and ours.

I want to reiterate that I propose to vote for the banking bill under discussion, obnoxious as it is to me, provided the Goldsborough amendment is adopted. If it is not adopted, however, I shall be a balky mule and refuse to cast my vote for a measure which tends to create a financial dictator.

We ought to do something for the people and not so much for the bankers. Bankers—that is all I hear—bankers. Do you know we are taking $1,200,000,000 of the people's money in Postal Savings and turning it over to the banks of America at 2½-percent interest, without a cent of security, and the bankers are relending this money back to you and me at 7 percent? We are giving the bankers of America over $50,000,000 a year as a subsidy for the use of our own money, and in the monstrous social security old-age pension bill we provide only $49,000,000 for the millions of our aged, worthy citizens. Moreover, I regret to state that the Post Office Department is opposed to a bill which I introduced to take from these bankers the $50,000,000 a year subsidy which the Post Office Department gives them. Although many of you are aware of these facts, I know of no one, other than myself, who has introduced legislation to correct the situation.

If it were not for the administration jerk line, I believe the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee or the Chairman of the Post Office Committee would consider my proposal favorably, as I recognize that both of them are individuals of intelligence and ability, and certainly every Member of Congress should be opposed to granting millions of subsidies like these to the international bankers.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose you do not pass this bill, will you not be worse off than if you did pass it? Does not the bill give you some relief, without the Goldsborough amendment? If it does, why should you kill it?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Personally, I have the utmost confidence in the President, but this President of ours will not head our Government always, although we Democrats confidently hope that he will be reelected in 1936. The Republicans, however, say we are going to have a Republican President next year.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, they have another guess coming.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Regardless of who may be President in 1936, we should not enact legislation to grant authority to any single individual to control the finances of our Nation as is indirectly proposed in this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I want my very good friend to come back next year and I want him to get on the President's coattails in the next primary and then he will come back.

Mr. HOEPPEL. My first objective as a Representative is to legislate for and in behalf of the people. I am not interested in reelection or patronage if such will interfere with my obligation to my constituents. I did not get on the President's coattails in the last election. I criticized some of the new-deal provisions, and I was reelected upon my past record and a platform of monetary reform and taxation of the machine which displaces human labor. Part of the Democratic machine sought to defeat me but thousands of Republicans, as well as Democrats, voted for me because I was independent and refused to be a rubber stamp in the Seventy-third Congress. Monetary reform and the taxing of the machine displacing human labor were the principle issues of my 1934 platform. I was reelected on that platform and I will be reelected next year if my people are satisfied with my representation, but whether or not I am reelected I will be a bellwether and not follow the leader just because I might be reelected or might receive some patronage jobs. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, the administration of the public currency under the power to issue money and to regulate and control its value is the exercise of a public governmental function to promote and conserve the common welfare. The conduct of commercial and investment banking, operations dealing in money and credits, in loans, interests, and discounts is in pursuance of a private interest for profit and selfish gain, different, separate and absolutely foreign, unrelated, and wholly incompatible with the administration of public currency. Private bankers and financial interests stand in no more or closer relationship with the power to issue and regulate money and are no more entitled to exercise such powers than a grain dealer or produce dealer is entitled to influence and control the production or supply of grain or produce in which and accordingly as his private selfish interests may require. A private banker or financier has no more legitimate claim or right to control the issue of public currency or to regulate its value than a blacksmith or a brickmaker or any other man in a private business.

The exercise of the power to issue money is purely a public, governmental function, in the administration of public office, in which private profit, advantage, and gain is inconsistent, incompatible, and abhorrent to every principle of public interest and welfare. This so-called "Federal Reserve System" is a vicious, criminal, and corrupt confusion of private selfish interests with the administration of public office. Under this so-called "Federal Reserve System" the one of all classes of men, the men having a private and selfish interest to serve, and which is adverse and at variance with the interest of the common and producing classes, are given the control of public currency for exercise under guarded secrecy. Under the artifice and subterfuge of this private currency system, the international bankers and financiers are allowed to don the robes of public office, to hold the keys to the people's Treasury, to pillage and plunder from the inside, to take and carry away unawares to the people that for which other men in office would be convicted of high crimes and misdemeanors, and for which other men out of office would be charged with burglary and highway robbery.

Private bankers and financiers claiming and possessing superior knowledge of the functions and operations of public currency should have less power and opportunity to influence and control money operations than other men without such information. This is because that by such greater and superior knowledge they can exert a greater and controlling influence over the operations of public currency for their own private advantage and profit than other men less skilled and adept. Such bankers and financiers, claiming and possessing such superior knowledge, should be held further away and more remote from position and opportunity to exercise the power to issue money and to control and regulate its value than other classes of men.

No one class of men should ever be allowed to control the volume and supply of money. And above all, private bankers and financiers should never be allowed to control the volume and supply of money.

The banker's training disqualifies him to control the volume and supply of money. The banker is trained to measure all values by the dollar. The dollar is created to serve the people but the bankers are trained to make the people serve the dollar.

But this does not apply to the bankers we know. This applies to the bankers we do not know, to the bankers we only know of and to whom the people and the country should be guarded against and know less of.

The bankers we know are part of the people. They suffer with the people. They are victims with the people. With the bankruptcy of 4,000,000 farmers has come the failure of 10,000 bankers.

No individual or body of men exercising control over public currency, the power to issue and regulate money should ever be allowed to take profits or advantage from the administration of the public currency system, while participating in such administration and control. Such profit, advantage, and selfish gain is a violation and contravention of all public policy, is a perversion of public duty, is a vicious and unholy confusion of the private selfish interests of men with the exercise of governmental functions, condoning and compromising the public welfare, corrupting the administration of public office to serve private, selfish interests.

The taxing power, the power to levy and collect taxes from the people, the power to take from the people, is one of the great powers of government. This is the power to go down into the people's pockets and take their money, take a part of their money, a part of their property, earnings, and income, or, if need be, the power to take all of their earnings, wages, income, and property.

The taxing power is a necessary power, a necessary incident of government, and without which the Government could not exist for a single day. Yet, in the control of private, selfish interests, it is a power subject to great and flagrant abuse, by and through which to take from the people their earnings, income, and property, the fruits of their toil and labor, hidden, covered, and concealed under the color and forms of law. And to safeguard from the abuse of the taxing power and to hold this power beyond the reach and control of selfish interests and private corporations, our forefathers placed this great power in the House of Representatives, in the lower branch of Congress, nearest and closest to the people, for their surveillance and watchful care.

But there is another power of government greater than the taxing power, greater than the economic power, which shrewd and crafty men can use and have used to take and exact from the people their earnings, wages, and income, the fruits of their toil and labor, hidden, concealed, and unawares. That power is the power of money, the power to issue money, the power to regulate the value of money, the power to control the volume or supply of money and thereby the control of values and the general price level of property and commodities and labor and the products of labor.

The power to control the general price level, the power to lower prices, when men are ready and want to buy, the power to raise prices, when men are ready and want to sell, is a greater power than the taxing power. The power to control values and the general price level is the power to take earnings and income from the people until they are impoverished, until they are exhausted, until they are reduced to absolute want, without realizing the cause of their burdens and distress. Under the control of this power one class of men can be reduced to helpless bankruptcy and another class of men can be enriched and their wealth doubled and trebled. This is the power to issue and regulate the relative value of money with the commodity and labor price level, with a power operating in secret, hidden, covered, and concealed, whereby to multiply taxes, debts, and contract obligations by reducing values, prices, and wages, and taking away from the people their means, property, and substance, and depriving them of their ability to pay, unawares.

It was one of the great Rothschild brothers, one of the world's shrewd, crafty financiers, who said: "Give me the power to issue money and I care not who makes the laws."

This is because the power to issue and control money is a greater power than the legislative power, greater than the power to make the laws; because the power to issue and control money is a greater power than the judicial power, the power to construe and apply the laws; because the power to issue and control money is a greater power than the executive power, the power to administer and enforce the laws; because the power to issue and control money is greater than the taxing power, greater than all governmental powers combined under and by which to take from the people.

And it was Thomas Jefferson who said "private banks with power to issue money are more dangerous to the liberties of the people than standing armies in time of peace", meaning the power resorted to by kings to seize upon the functions of government and usurp the rights of people.

Under, by, and through the secret power of money, more tribute can be taken from the people and greater tribute has been exacted from the people, secretly hidden, covered, and concealed, than ever despotic rulers have taken from their helpless and dependent subjcts; than ever invading, marauding kings, using the force of the military, the army, and the navy, have ever exacted and claimed as leaders of victorious armies in the pillage and plunder of the vanquished and carried off as the spoils of war.

Our forefathers in their wisdom realized that the use of money was a vital public agency, a blessing and a power for good, but under private selfish control could be made an evil and a curse. And to safeguard against such private control of money our forefathers wisely provided in the Federal Constitution for the control of public currency directly by the Congress of the United States, the sworn and chosen representatives of all the people to serve the public welfare. Clause V, section 8, of article I of the Federal Constitution vests Congress with the exclusive power to coin and issue money and to regulate its measure and value as a medium or means of exchange.

This greater power to issue money, alike with the exercise of the taxing power, was committed in sacred trust to be exercised by Congress, directly and immediately responsible to the people.

A surrender of the taxing power of Congress, a delegation and transfer of the taxing power, or even a suggestion or proposal for the exercise and administration of the taxing power by private, selfish interests, would be denounced and condemned as a vicious public policy, as a course of criminal folly, as a breach of office and trust, compromising the interest and welfare of the people. Such a surrender, suggestion, or proposal would be challenged and resented as an act of treachery and treason, a charge of high crimes and misdemeanors under punishment by fine, imprisonment, and death. And the taxing power remains today where the Constitution placed it, in the lower House of Congress, nearest and closest to the people for their direct and prompt control.

But the far greater governmental power, the greatest of all governmental powers, the most vital of all public functions, the power to issue money, the power to regulate the value of money, the power to control the supply and distribution of money, which our forefathers in their wisdom committed in sacred trust to the Congress of the United States, the sworn representatives of the people, has been abdicated by Congress, and the duties and obligations imposed and the responsibilities charged to safeguard money and the use of money has been surrendered and abandoned by Congress. In disregard of the Constitution, in violation and in defiance of the Constitution, Congress has surrendered, delegated, and transferred its power to issue money and regulate the value thereof over to a private, selfish banking corporation today known as the "Federal Reserve System."

Pursuant to the taxing power conferred and preliminary to the exercise of such power, Congress created and established a great public revenue system for the collection and disbursement of taxes complete in all particulars and in every detail. Under this system, thus created and established for the exercise of the taxing power, policies of taxation were declared and principles defined, mandatory duties were imposed, prohibitions and checks were provided to safeguard against the abuse of the power and to assure a faithful, impartial, and just course of administration and enforcement. And to further safeguard and enjoin the duties and restraints to be observed, a criminal code was especially enacted defining crimes of commission and omission, providing punishment and penalties to be imposed, with fines and terms of imprisonment under strict and summary enforcement.

And finally, for still further assurance against evils and abuses of the taxing power, the glaring searchlight of publicity was thrown with sweeping scrutiny upon each and every successive step of administration from the assessment and collection of taxes to detailed disbursement and final accountability. Nothing was left unprovided which in human forethought could be apprehended, in the course of exercise, administration, and enforcement, to safeguard against an impartial levy, evasion, payment, or collection of taxes, or to compel strict accountability of the funds taken from the earnings of the people and their faithful application to the purposes for which assessed and collected.

The Constitution vested in Congress the broad power to issue money and to regulate and control its value, but without creating a system or organization through which to carry out and give effect to the power granted and conferred. Congress, alike as with the duty to provide a system under which to exercise the taxing power, was left with the duty and obligation to provide a money-control system, to create a money-governmental department, to set up a money instrumentality, and to specify the course of operations, to supply the people at all times with money for the exchange of services and commodities, and to safeguard them in its free and proper use. The power to issue money, vested in Congress, was for a public use and service, and contemplated the organization of a departmental money or currency system as free from private selfish control as other departments of the Government or the action of the Congress itself.

But in disregard of the public power conferred, in defiance of the public functions contemplated, to provide a money supply for the people, shrewd and crafty financiers and bankers set up, offered, and led Congress to adopt a private selfish banking system instead, organized for private profit and selfish gain. First, the private selfish character of the system so created and set up and strategically forced upon the Government, was hidden, covered, and concealed under the artifice, guise, name, and style of "The United States Bank", later, "The National Banking System", and now under the deceptive cloak of the Federal Reserve System.

Some of the 12 branch banks of this private banking system, assuming a public duty and function, but organized and operated for selfish gain, have been making and realizing $10,000 a day, and the system as a whole has been declaring from 150- to 200-percent dividends on the capital invested by loaning the people's money to the people.

First, in the beginning, a partnership was assumed for the share of earnings of the Government. But finally coming out in the open and assuming complete and absolute independence, all public obligations were renounced as well as responsibility for the public welfare, and all profits were claimed and taken as their own. Today, the power conferred by the Constitution, the public power to issue and control money, is being exercised by a private banking system privately owned, privately operated, privately controlled, conducted for private profit and selfish gain, in violation of the constitutional power granted and in defiance of every principle of public policy.

But even more than this surrender to private banks and financial interests, to private ownership, administration, and control of the people's money and credit system, Congress has failed in its duty to create, set up, and establish even a form or semblance of a public currency system to safeguard the exercise of the constitutional power and the free and proper use of money by the people.

It is a significant fact of history that all just governments over men have been governments by laws, declaring policies, and defining principles of human rights and justice between man and man, mandating the discharge of public duties, and restraining against encroachments from greedy, selfish human nature. All governments by the will of men, without the safeguards of constitutions and laws, declaring and defining principles of justice and right, without mandating duties to be performed, without prohibitions restraining selfish human nature have been cruel despotisms or dictatorships under which the people are held to languish in slavery and serfdom. And what is true of general governmental powers organized to conserve peace and civil rights is equally true of a money departmental system or for any exercise of other government.

There can be no more a just money system under the arbitrary will of men left to exercise their unrestrained discretion without laws declaring and defining principles and the policy of controlling money and credits than there can be a just civil governmental system under the unrestrained will and discretion of men. We have advanced and progressed in the science of general government from governments by the will of men, from despotisms and dictatorships, to governmental systems by laws safeguarding and assuring men in the enjoyment of their natural rights.

But in the science of money, in monetary or currency systems controlling and safeguarding the use of money, the people are still in the Stone Age; they are still peering out from the caves, while the shrewd and crafty money chiefs are holding the tribal many, the masses, in monetary slavery and currency bondage.

Our forefathers in framing the Constitution failed to provide a monetary system with the grant of power conferred and left the vital agency of money to be created and safeguarded by Congress, under, by and through which to exercise the power of issuing money. And Congress failing to act, failing to create a governmental money system, failing to adopt laws and regulations declaring and defining exact principles and policies governing the administration of money, our governmental money system has been left in the arbitrary control and direction of men without principles and policies determined, without laws defining administrative duties, without mandating obligations, without prohibitions, restraining selfish human nature, left with the powers to be exercised and administered under a monetary despotism, under a bankers' dictatorship, with the people to linger and languish in economic slavery and bondage.

It remains for this or some succeeding Congress, in discharge of the duty and obligation assumed, to provide a governmental money system, with laws declaring and defining exact duties, prescribing the exact course of currency operations, under which to exercise the constitutional power of issuing and regulating the money supply. A currency system must be created with positive mandates imposed to compel the performance of fixed duties, with prohibitions to check and restrain the encroachments of selfish human nature, and policies as fixed and certain as the sacred Bill of Rights, leaving nothing to the will or discretion of men in the control and administration of money.

We are today under a money system controlled and directed by the will of men without mandates to compel the performance of duties or prohibitions to restrain human nature to safeguard monetary rights and economic security. We are today under a monetary despotism, under a bankers' dictatorship, and under which the people of the country remain suffering, held and languish in abject monetary slavery and economic bondage and servitude.

The one and only hope for economic and currency relief and recovery from the panic or depression, is a system of monetary laws prescribing a certain, fixed monetary policy, an exact rule of currency operations, to be administered and carried out with certain fixed duties to be performed without discretion left to the will of men.

This currency bill under consideration with all its amendments and changes up to this time proposed and considered will leave the people of the country remaining under private monetary ownership and control, under a monetary depotism, and absolute currency dictatorship, with the international bankers the arbiters of the economic destiny of the people.

And until such currency system is created, until exact principles are declared, until the precise course of operations are defined, until the money polar star or goal is set for the administration of currency and credit by a system of defined principles and positive laws leaving nothing to the will or discretion of men, until the vital constitutional power to issue and regulate the distribution of money is removed beyond the reach and control, beyond the discretion and will of interested men with positive mandate imposed to compel the performance of fixed and certain duties and prohibitions restraining usurpation and encroachment, the vital control of public currency will be left to the strategy and intrigue of rival financiers and manipulating bankers who will spar and maneuver for control as kings once fought and maneuvered in conquest and subjugation for the wastes and spoils of war.

It is not possible in the time allotted nor is it the proper time and place to consider the history of our money system further than the economic conditions which gave rise to the organization and inception of our present so-called "Federal Reserve System" and the causes which brought it into being.

The money panic coming in 1907 had served a great object lesson before the people—served to awaken and arouse the people to a realization of the power of money, to a realization that in our money system the way had been left open for the control of manipulating financiers, money pirates, gamblers, and monopolists, who were using the power of money for selfish gain, profits, and their own advantage, and to prey upon and take from the people.

And in 1910 the abuse of money had become so flagrant, so great a menace to the public welfare, that the people, in righteous wrath and indignation, urged and demanded a change in our money system and that the power over money be taken away from gambling financiers and reclaimed back to the Government and the sworn and chosen representatives of the people.

And in 1913, following the demand, the old national-bank money system was modified and superseded by Congress, and in its place and stead the Federal Reserve money system was created and established in operation.

The Federal Reserve money bill finally enacted into law, originally undertook to place the control of money and public currency wholly in governmental agencies. But the international bankers entered such determined opposition that a compromise was agreed upon to save the proposed legislation from failure and the defeat of the bill. By this compromise the same bankers were left in control of the currency but under the oath and charged with the administration of the system as a public duty and in partnership with the Government for the control of the volume and supply of money.

The old law imposed no such positive public duty upon the bankers and it was believed that such oath and obligation of a public trust and the provisions for the immediate control of the discount rate and open-market operations would safeguard the welfare of the public and would justify the repeal or modification of the old law and the enactment of the new. It was this compromise or no currency legislation. But practice and experience in the working operations of this law have shown that manipulating bankers are not greatly influenced in their course by an oath, and their conduct is not materially different whether under oath or acting without such obligation.

Bringing all explanations of this Reserve currency system down to the last and final analysis, the change in our money system was made, the new Federal Reserve money system was created, for the sole object and purpose of holding the currency within the direction and the control of the sworn and chosen representatives of the people, Congress, the Government; to stabilize currency, values, and the price level, to make the administration of public money an open function for public observation at all times and to remove commerce, industry, and trade beyond the reach of manipulating financiers under secret gentlemen agreements.

The Federal Reserve money system provided all the means necessary for the full and complete control of currency in circulation, to prevent violent inflation and drastic contraction, and thereby to maintain an even volume and supply of money and to stabilize values and the price level. But the centralized power provided for under this Reserve System was, therefore, susceptible of abuse and maladministration, and the means and facilities provided to maintain an even volume and supply of currency could be reversed in their operations and used to bring about inflation or contraction the same as other powers conferred upon men are susceptible of abuse and maladministration.

The Federal Reserve money system, with policies and the course of operations defined by positive law, with mandates and prohibitions imposed and required to be observed under a good-faith public administration, would have been the most perfect and the most effective and complete instrumentality for the control of the volume and supply of money and to stabilize values and the price level which had ever been devised by men as a part of the agencies of government. But, by reason of its concentration of power in one central body under private control, it became at once a threatening danger, a monster, menacing evil, in the hands or subject to the controlling influence of selfish, greedy interests. And by reason of this concentration of power it became a greater danger and menace, even greater than the old national-bank money system, the evils and abuse of which it was to remedy.

The Federal Reserve money system may be compared with or to a new, efficient, effective weapon prepared by men for their own defense, which falling into the hands of the enemy can be turned and used against them with deadly, destructive effect, and by which they can be overcome and enslaved by means and instrumentalities devised by themselves for their own protection and defense.

This new currency legislation was pointed to as the crowning legislative achievement of Congress and the President in 1913 for the prevention of panics and depressions through the scientific control of money provided for and enjoined under the law. But in the administration of the System, and under amendments made from time to time, it has not only failed of such accomplishment, but the operation of these facilities have been used to create a panic instead of preventing one.

Through the door of private control, left open under this new money system, the international financiers and manipulating bankers have entered the sacred chambers of money and when once entrance gained to the inside they have exerted a thousandfold more power to manipulate the currency of the country than was ever exerted through gentlemen agreements operating under the national-bank system.

Under this new money system, money was to be issued and paid out as called for by the banks of the country, upon notes, mortgages, and prime commercial paper to meet the needs of their business affairs, with the people and their local banks to be the masters of the system and the Reserve banks their servants. But through amendments made to the law, always under claim of some great pressing emergency, and under a secret perverted administration, taking advantage of the concentration of power, the system has been made a monster money octopus, commanding and coercing the banks it was to serve, dictating not only the money policy of our own country but the currency system of other nations as well and the control of the world price level.

Under the abuse of its powers, in withholding and denying credit and contracting and withdrawing money from circulation, instead of preventing panics as intended, the powers have been perverted and used to bring the most disastrous panic in all history, with its withering blight carried to every civilized country of the world.

Such was the system for the control of money and such were the men behind the screens directing the operations and policies of the system when the blight of this panic fell upon the people and the industries of the country, prostrating, stifling, and paralyzing not only industry here but throughout the world. And the same system remains in operation today, left subject to the same private control, left to dictate the money supply of the country, left to lower values when they want to buy, left to raise prices when they want to sell, left multiplying the value of their money and debts in crushing burdens upon the people.

The master minds of finance as directors and shareholders of the member banks of the system, owning the controlling shares of stock of the Federal Reserve money system, and directing its operations in secret today, are the same men who, under a secret gentlemen's agreement, operating to corner and monopolize the money supply, under the national bank system, brought on the money panic of 1907. They are the same men who held the secret bankers' meeting May 18, 1920, in Washington, D. C., and secretly contracted currency and credit, using the Federal Reserve money system and brought on this panic, beginning first in 1920. They are the same men who operated through the Reserve system to expand currency and credit in 1928, suddenly raising values and the price level, stimulating a bull stock movement to unload worthless stocks and bonds upon the unsuspecting investing public, brought on the stock market crash and the second panic following in 1929.

They are the same financiers and bankers who acquired from foreign nations and people at low discounted values, over twenty billions of worthless foreign bonds, and unloaded them, through the member banks of the Federal Reserve System, upon the unsuspecting and unsophisticated people of this country, realizing some two billions in commissions or profits, and reserving not a single bond for their own investment which they had recommended to the people.

In 1907 the people of the country were in revolt and calling for repeal of the National Bank money system, operated under private direction and control, and were demanding that the power over money be recovered back to the Government for public control and administration. It was to meet and frustrate this demand for public control of the money supply that the Federal Reserve money system was brought before Congress and provided, with the Government and bankers to be in partnership, assuming public control of the money supply, but with the same bankers left as owners of the system. The people were thrown off their guard, the movement for public control was dissipated in the glowing tributes to elastic currency, the private control of money was continued on uninterrupted, avarice, and greed again asserted itself supreme and the grasping money changers left in control, in their mad race for profit and gain, for quick wealth and swollen fortunes, brought on this the greatest panic of all times.

The people are now standing again today where they stood after the money panic of 1907, demanding the public control of money, and again a more "liberalized" system is proposed to mislead and throw the people off their guard, to perpetuate the private control of money. If this proposal to modify and revamp the Federal Reserve money system by so-called "liberalization of the policy", without further amendment than now proposed, is carried out as now planned, history will again repeat itself and the system of private control of money will be continued on, with manipulating bankers directing its operations. This proposal now to amend and modify the Federal Reserve money system, leaving the private bankers in control, discounts the intelligence of the people and presumes upon the impotency of Congress to uphold and defend their rights and interests and conserve the public welfare.

There can be no permanent relief from this panic, from the burdens and evils of this depression; there can be no security for lasting prosperity while the power over money remains in the control of private banking interests, the international and manipulating financiers, and until the control over our money supply is recovered back to Congress and the Government and administered for the public welfare instead of private gain, profit, and advantage.

The proposed Federal Reserve amendment now heralded as the new relief program, without further amendment is only another delusive maneuver to throw the people off their guard and to perpetuate the fraud of private control by assuming to eradicate the evils of the system while leaving the currency and credit in the same private control for manipulation, and should be repudiated and resented by Congress and by every loyal and patriotic citizen of the land under the demand for immediate recovery of the control of money back to the Government, where the Constitution placed it and where it can be safeguarded and administered in the interests of all the people.

If this proposal to modify and ameliorate the evils of the Federal Reserve System, to prolong and perpetuate private control of the money system of the country for further exploitation of the people, is not met and challenged today, and the power recovered back to the Government, the ordeal will be cowardly passed on to the next or succeeding generation to regain what we have sacrificed and condoned and the crisis left to be met in the throes of bloodshed and revolution when the burdens have become crushing and intolerable.

A majority in Congress today is ready to take steps to recover back the constitutional power over money and they would take the step if they were only assured that the people would not again be misled by the shrewd and crafty propaganda of financiers under the claim of currency reform, sound money, and an honest dollar, and the delusive hue and cry of inflation, fiat money, printing-press money, and they would be upheld and sustained in the recovery of public control of money and the credits of the country.

Taking advantage of religious beliefs and the phenomena of life and nature, many great and delusive frauds have been practiced upon the people, under the pretense and strategy of which to take from them the fruits of their toil and labor. But the money illusion, the mystification of money operations, the currency maneuvers under cover and concealment, for the number of people held in awe and misapprehension, for the time in which held in mystery and bewilderment upon them, is the most gigantic and colossal fraud of all deceptions perpetrated upon mankind.

The CHAIRMAN. For the benefit of the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Ohio, the Chair will state that the gentleman from Alabama has 1 hour and 20 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Ohio 2 hours and 30 minutes remaining.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7617, and had come to no resolution thereon.

OUR NATIONAL WATERWAYS

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein an address delivered by our colleague, Hon. J. J. MANSFIELD, Chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress in Washington, and to the country by Nation-wide radio hook-up, broadcast over the system of the National Broadcasting Co., May 2, 1935.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. JOSEPH J. MANSFIELD, Chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, of the House of Representatives, before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, in Washington, and to the country by Nation-wide radio, broadcast over the system of the National Broadcasting Co., May 2, 1935:

OUR NATIONAL WATERWAYS—A FREE AND PRICELESS INHERITANCE OF THE PEOPLE, AN ESSENTIAL NECESSITY TO EVERY AMERICAN INDIVIDUAL AND TO EVERY AMERICAN HOME

Mr. President and delegates to the National River and Harbor Congress, it is a particular pleasure for me to appear before this Congress and to have the opportunity to speak to you on the significant part our national waterways have played in the economic development of the Republic. I know that you are thoroughly familiar with the benefits which have accrued from low-cost water transportation and its ever-increasing necessity in the complexities of present-day commercial competition. I regret exceedingly that the general public is not so well informed, and I believe it to be the duty of those of us who are interested in the further development of our waterways to utilize every opportunity to present to the public their importance to the prosperity of the Nation as a whole.

As a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives for 14 years, and as chairman for 4 years, I have been closely associated with the formulation of the national policy for the improvement and maintenance of our waterways—a policy which calls for the conservation and improvement of these waterways by the Federal Government with the aid and active support of the local interests benefited by these improvements—a policy which has kept these natural arteries of commerce the property of the people as a whole, free and unfettered in their use as public highways by each and every citizen.

This policy has not been an overnight development, but is the outgrowth of more than a century of action and legislation which, beginning with feeble indications of a national interest in the work, has developed into the broad and comprehensive program now in evidence.

The first river and harbor legislation enacted by Congress in 1789 consisted in assenting to certain improvements sponsored by the individual States. The first appropriation for river and harbor improvements was made in 1802, and from 1826 to the Civil War, Congress periodically provided appropriations for this purpose. The close of the Civil War and the return of industrial activity brought to the front the necessity for a still more comprehensive program to provide reasonable facilities for our ever-growing commerce. From 1866 to 1920, Congress continued the passage of these periodical river and harbor bills, and in 1920 adopted its present policy of enacting general river and harbor legislation to include the authorization of definite projects and the expenditures necessary for the completion of these projects every several years, and making available in the annual War Department appropriation a lump sum for application to these authorized projects. No legislation which comes before Congress receives more critical examination or stands more on its own merits than these river and harbor bills, and no committee of Congress receives more expert and disinterested advice than the River and Harbor Committee does from the Army engineers in its investigations into the merits of the individual projects.

The necessity for these improvements and the important part which they play in the life of America is but poorly understood. In the early days of the Republic its expansion was governed in large part by its rivers, as these highways provided by nature were the only reliable means of transporting even the simple necessities of our pioneer ancestors. Today, in our modern complex civilization, the importance of water-borne commerce to the daily life of every citizen is even more evident, and the very necessities of this life depend upon facilities for commerce, and particularly water-borne commerce. For example, let us look around the room in which we are sitting. The radiator is made of iron. The ore from which this iron is made comes from the region of the Great Lakes where it is shipped in large lake carriers to lake ports to be unloaded and carried by rail to the iron foundries. The cost of the radiator is lessened by reason of the improvements in the channels and harbors of the Great Lakes, provided by the Federal Government, so its use is no longer confined to the wealthy, but is available to the average home. The shellac with which our floors and furniture are painted comes from India by ship. Every article about the house composed of rubber or gutta-percha depends for its cost on the cost of water transportation. Practically all of our electricity is made available for use through rubber insulation of one kind or another. The costs of our tea and coffee are lessened by the port facilities provided by the Federal Government. The silk used in our clothing, and many other essential items in our normal everyday existence are made possible at a reasonable cost only by the improved navigation facilities provided by the Government. Along the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers the people get practically all of their heat from coal shipped from the Kentucky and West Virginia coal fields in huge river tows carrying 12,000 tons of coal each.

River cities, such as Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Memphis, have been built up by low-cost water transportation and would have to alter their commercial existence were it not for the advantages afforded by improved streams.

We cannot leave our homes and go into the streets without coming into direct contact with modern necessities and conveniences imported to provide us with a more comfortable existence. The asphalt on our streets, the tires on the automobiles using the streets, have become practicable for use only because their cost has been brought within reach by the improvement of our waterways and harbors. These improvements are, of course, paid for indirectly by each and every one of us, but each and every one of us receives a direct return from our investment. There is no public expenditure that is so useful and fairly distributed, both as to cost and benefit, as these improvements. The cost to any one individual is small, and the benefits reached are continuous and ever present in our daily lives, composing a part of every meal, of every day wearing apparel, and affecting our daily heat, light, and the other necessities and luxuries enjoyed by the American citizen.

The use of these articles is taken for granted, and the average man in the streets, when he visualizes a waterway, thinks of it as a natural gift to mankind. This is far from true. Our Atlantic coast was provided by Nature, with but one harbor with a draft of 30 feet. New York Harbor, the greatest port in the world, with an annual tonnage of 130,000,000, valued at over $30,000,000,000, had a natural entrance channel of only 23 feet, which has been increased by the Federal Government to a depth of 40 feet and a width of 2,000 feet, with many interconnected channels and anchorage basins.

The great ports of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, the Gulf ports, including the booming Texas oil ports, the ore and coal centers of the Great Lakes, and our inland waterways reaching far into the interior of the country and providing the agricultural regions with transportation costs comparable to the seacoast, have all been improved by the Federal Government and have played an ever-increasing part in the growth of the industrial and commercial life of the Nation. These developments which have given the American Nation a system of harbors and waterways equaled by no other Nation in the world, have resulted from far-seeing vision and skillful engineering execution.

Congress throughout the years has appropriated a total of $2,000,000,000 for maintenance and improvement of our navigable waterways, which carry an annual commerce of 583,800,000 tons, valued at $24,311,000,000. This work has been carried out quietly and efficiently from the first authorization by Congress, by the Army Engineers. Theirs is not an organization which seeks publicity in the unobtrusive performance of its work, and I would feel that I had neglected my own duty if I did not take this opportunity to speak briefly of its record and achievements.

First organized by the Continental Congress in 1776, and definitely established by Congress in 1789 under the leadership of Brigadier General du Portail, a distinguished French volunteer, this organization has since been in continued existence, and from its earliest days, has been charged with many of the more important construction and engineering activities of the Government.

Its officers are honor graduates of the United States Military Academy or selected graduates of our leading technical schools. These officers are given a year of post graduate training in specially chosen technical subjects, a year at the Engineer School of Application, which specializes in an intensive course in river and harbor engineering, and are further trained by actual field experience in responsible positions, their responsibilities being increased as rapidly as experience permits. They are aided in their work by a civil engineering organization containing the highest type of engineering talent available in this country and imbued with the same spirit and traditions. The names on the roster of the Corps of Engineers include some of the most illustrious in American history. Lee, Beauregard, Meade, McClellan, Joseph E. Johnston, Pope, Halleck, McPherson, Goethals, and Siebert, and their successors of today, McArthur and Markham, are men who have contributed much to the progress of America. Their work has included, in addition to the supervision of river and harbor improvements, many other engineering achievements of note. McNeil and Whistler were both Army engineers who played an outstanding part in the development of the country's first railroad system. Much of the early exploration and mapping of the great West was under the direction of this corps which has been charged for many years with special surveys for the Federal Government. Their accomplishments in the field of municipal engineering have included the construction of many of the public buildings in Washington, such as the Washington Monument, the Library of Congress, the Lincoln Memorial, the Memorial Bridge across the Potomac, and the water-supply system of the District of Columbia. Their work has covered the entire continent of the United States, Hawaii, Philippine Islands, and Alaska. One of the outstanding features of engineering in the history of the world was the construction of the Panama Canal, which was completed under the direction of Gen. George W. Goethals, assisted by several other distinguished Army engineers.

The present organization is a worthy successor to the traditions and achievements of the past. Its work under the emergency relief programs has been outstanding. Its officers have been loaned to the emergency administrations. It has been directly charged with the expenditure of $350,000,000 of emergency funds. Its record in placing this work under way with a maximum of speed, in providing employment at the greatest possible rate, and at the same time sacrificing no standard of design or engineering, has and should receive national acclaim. The Government has been well served by this organization. The country is fortunate that Congress has always recognized the true significance and importance of waterway developments and has intrusted these developments to an organization particularly skilled in and adapted for this work.

Congress, with vision, has always appropriated the necessary funds so that our waterway improvements have met the demands of American trade and has maintained these waterways free of cost to the people of the country as the property of the Nation. Their continued development must not cease. The Nation which desires to be in the foreground of the commercial nations of the world must anticipate commercial trends and must be prepared with the necessary transportation facilities to enable it to successfully compete with other nations in the world market, where transportation costs often prove a vital factor in gaining or losing these trades.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL—1936

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6718, the agricultural appropriation bill, and that the House further insist upon its disagreement to all Senate amendments, except amendments numbered 8, 58, and 60, and that the House insist on its amendment to Senate amendment numbered 29, and that a further conference be had with the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6718, the agricultural appropriation bill, further insist on its disagreement to all of the Senate amendments, except Nos. 8, 58, and 60, that the House insist on its amendment to Senate amendment numbered 29, and that a further conference be had with the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us what those amendments are that are left out?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Those are the three amendments which were agreed to by the House at the time the conference report was adopted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. SANDLIN, CANNON of Missouri, TARVER, BUCHANAN, THURSTON, and BUCKBEE.

FAITHFUL, DEPENDABLE LOYALTY TO FRIENDS IS THE CARDINAL PRINCIPLE OF MY LIFE

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there are members of three American Legion posts in Sweetwater, Tex., who recently have taken up with me matters relating to a C. C. C. camp and a postmastership there. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include some data and letters bearing on the above and to be referred to in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, that will not take a lot of space in the RECORD, will it?

Mr. BLANTON. I will say to my good friend the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma that it will not take nearly as many pages as we Members of the House who are the gentleman's friends and coworkers here have allowed the gentleman from Oklahoma to use at will during the last several months.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. That is what I want to know. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on April 25, 1935, I received from Mr. John M. Moore, of Sweetwater, Tex., a Western Union night letter advising me that he was an applicant for the postmastership and indicating that he would have the endorsement of the American Legion there.

I immediately replied by letter dated April 25, 1935, advising Mr. Moore that his night letter received that day was the first intimation I had had that he would be an applicant or that any members of the American Legion would endorse an applicant, and I stated:

Your application comes too late for you to be considered for the temporary appointment as acting postmaster, as on yesterday the Department, on my recommendation, selected the one to act as temporary acting postmaster until the regular civil-service examination can be held.

Soon after a change is made, and the acting postmaster is installed, the Civil Service will announce an examination in which you will be allowed to compete. You can get your application blank from the post office there after the examination has been announced.

A few days thereafter I received from Mr. John M. Moore his letter dated at Sweetwater, Tex., April 25, 1935, enclosing an endorsement signed by citizens, copy of which was sent to the Post Office Department.

Although, except as to Mr. W. H. Jobe, there is hearty cooperation between all Democratic officials in the counties of my district and myself, with respect to the few appointments I am allowed to make, Mr. Jobe not only has always opposed me politically but in several instances he has tried to go around me and over my head on different matters that were wholly my own prerogatives.

There was sent to me a copy of the Reporter for April 21, 1935, stating that Mr. Jobe had wired the Post Office Department regarding a matter which the Department has invariably accorded to the majority Members of Congress to handle themselves, and acting with Mr. Jobe there has been a little coterie of business men in Sweetwater who have always been my political enemies and who have always tried to hamstring me at every turn. And said copy of the Reporter contained the following:

The Reporter has been asked to announce that a group of business men are sponsoring a bean feed for all ex-service men of Sweetwater and vicinity, to be held at 7:30 Monday evening at the Macie Hotel.

The affair is to be absolutely free, with no donations, no solicitations, and no specific organizations are to be represented.

I had reports from a number of constituents in Sweetwater advising me that the above "bean feed" was gotten up by enemies in the hopes of preventing me from exercising my privilege and prerogative of selecting one of my friends as temporary acting postmaster. The Reporter for April 25, 1935, stated that all of the endorsers of Mr. John M. Moore were insisting on the Republican incumbent not being removed, but allowed to remain in the office until next January. Hence the fact that the incumbent was a Republican was in no way objectionable to them. These enemies were perfectly satisfied with any Republican they might choose. They just did not want me to exercise my own privilege and prerogative of favoring one of my own friends.

Our Democratic administration was unusually kind to the Republican incumbent at Sweetwater. It allowed him to remain in office from March 4, 1933, when we took over the Government, until May 1, 1935, when the Department removed him for cause. As a matter of fact, he had held the office for more than 4 full years, as he took charge of the office on March 31, 1931. And the Department offered him the privilege of resigning, of which he did not avail himself. When I learned definitely that the Department was going to remove Mr. Shields, and his friends claimed that he needed time to arrange his affairs, I did him the courtesy to wire him that if he would send the Department his resignation to take effect at the close of business on May 15, I would make a special effort to get the Department to approve it, but he did not appreciate this courtesy. When the Republicans took over the Government with President Harding's administration, they promptly removed Democrats all over Texas, hence Mr. Shields was accorded unusually kind and considerate treatment by our Democratic administration.

THAT FREE "BEAN FEED"

One of my good friends in Sweetwater, who is a World War veteran, and was overseas and in the trenches of France during the war, has given me the following very interesting information regarding the attempt to use ex-service men for a selfish purpose:

SWEETWATER, TEX., April 26, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Member of Congress from Texas, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: While I have no desire to enter the lists in any controversial issue involving folks in my home town, I feel that I am obliged to advise you the situation that obtains in connection with the muchly heralded "veteran sponsorship" of John Moore for the post office in Sweetwater.

First, let me say that there are 600 World War veterans in Nolan County. That these 600 men are not so strong for sponsorships or organization is shown by the fact that Oscar McDonald Post, No. 109, of the American Legion has a membership of 51; Musician's Post, No. 333, of the American Legion, has 26; and Sweetwater Post, No. 2479, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, has a membership of 35, or a total of 112 members in the various orders in the county that could possibly be affected by any appointment to the local post office.

At the meeting of veterans of the county so widely publicized there were 68 people present, of which approximately 30 were members of some veterans' organization. The remaining 38 were not only members of no organization but most of them have never been members. In my opinion they did not represent in any sense the veterans of this county, but rather a small group of political malcontents urged on by scheming persons who were anxious to see their ideas carried out and who were perfectly willing (if their ideas failed of maturity) to see the poor old veteran get the blame for any resultant bad publicity and/or feeling.

I trust that before you give your approval to Mr. Moore's application for the office you will contact the leaders of the various veterans' organizations that are doing something for and in the community and find out their opinion as to whether all or any veterans in this county favor his appointment.

Personally I would favor the appointment of Mrs. Bowen, if she desired it; but I certainly would not want to stand idly by and permit the veterans of this county to be made the butt of a misguided ideal in any event.

Trusting that you will, as suggested, determine the true sentiment of the veterans of the county before you give anyone preference by virtue of their alleged sponsorship and with assurances of my desire to be of any assistance to you in this connection, I remain,

HAVE BEEN LOYAL FRIEND TO ALL VETERANS

No one could have done more than I have for all veterans. I helped to pass the law that allowed compensation to their dependents and that granted $10,000 war-risk insurance alike to the private the same as to the high officer. I helped to pass the laws for rehabilitation and for the various kinds of training after the war and for compensation and hospital treatment for the disabled. I helped disabled veterans not only in Sweetwater, and Nolan County, and my district, but also thousands of them all over the United States, to obtain needed hospitalization, treatment, operations, and compensation for themselves and their dependents. At my own expense I have inspected many hospitals over the United States and helped to remedy conditions adverse to their welfare and interests. I have conducted a number of investigations at my own expense, such as that I made of the Old Hospital No. 25 at Houston, Tex., causing 200 veterans dying with tuberculosis to be removed in 1 day to Prescott, Ariz., and Fort Bayard, N. Mex.; that of Col. Charles R. Forbes, Director of the Veterans Bureau; that of Col. Frederick A. Fenning, who was the guardian of and had robbed several hundred shell-shocked veterans; and that of Maj. William Wolff Smith, former general counsel of the Veterans' Bureau. I have helped to pass the laws that give veterans 10-percent preference rights on acquiring Government lands and on ratings for all civil-service positions. And I have shown special consideration to veterans when making the few appointments that have been allotted to me since the war. I helped to pass the law that granted adjusted compensation and that granted loans of 50 percent of same, and have in every instance voted to pay the adjusted-compensation certificates in full and to pass same over Presidential vetoes. Hence no truthful person can justly say that I have not been a true, faithful, dependable friend of all veterans.

A CONGRESSMAN'S PREROGATIVE

Our Democratic administrations while in power have always accorded to each Democratic Congressman the privilege and prerogative of naming one of his friends as the temporary acting postmaster to fill a vacancy until the regular civil-service competitive examination could be held.

NO TIME TO LOOK AFTER POLITICAL INTERESTS

When Congress is in session the Representative is busy here in Washington on his official duties day and night and does not have time to look after his own interests. Many times during election year he cannot go home until just a few weeks before the primary, notwithstanding that his opponents may have been actively campaigning his district for many months. If it were not for the fact that he has loyal friends in every county who look after his interests, he could not be reelected. They seek no reward. He cannot pay them for their loyalty. They will not even let him pay their expenses. They expect no recompense. And it is only natural that when the Congressman is given the privilege of appointing someone, as his own prerogative, that he should select the friend who had been most loyal and faithful to him upon whom to bestow such favor. If he did not do so, he would be an ingrate. And ingratitude is about the basest trait of human character.

FAITHFUL SERVICE TO SWEETWATER

Some of my dearest friends have lived in Sweetwater. During the campaign of 1916, when I was first elected to Congress from the old "jumbo district", embracing 59 counties, running from Mineral Wells to El Paso, the district being 556 miles east and west and about 400 miles north and south from Lubbock to Rock Springs, in Edwards County, it was a veritable empire.

Morris B. Howard, of Sweetwater, wrote hundreds of letters for me. He contacted not only his many friends in Sweetwater and Nolan County in my behalf, but he went to Fisher County, Jones County, Tom Green County, and even made a 1,000-mile trip out to El Paso and western counties for me. Not one dollar of expense would he ever accept from me. He expected no reward. No man could have done more for another in a campaign than he did for me, and he helped to elect me to Congress.

PLEDGED FIRST FEDERAL BUILDING TO SWEETWATER

After I was elected, because of the splendid help Morris Howard, Vard Woodruff, and other Sweetwater friends had accorded me in the campaign, I told them that the first Federal building that was granted to my district would be built in Sweetwater. I kept my promise. As soon as I entered Congress I introduced a bill to provide a Federal building for Sweetwater. But the war and after-war days stopped all building construction for a number of years. I saw to it that the first bill authorizing emergency building embraced one for Sweetwater. But it was several years before we passed any measure appropriating the money for construction of any Federal buildings. Congress finally authorized the Post Office Department and the Treasury Department to designate which of the buildings should be placed in the emergency list, and Sweetwater's building was in this list.

FINALLY SUCCEEDED IN GETTING THE APPROPRIATION

On June 20, 1930, we passed the bill in the House that appropriated $130,000 for the Sweetwater building. I quote from the RECORD of June 20, 1930, the following from the speech I made in the House of Representatives at that time:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, we have just passed without a dissenting vote an appropriation of $100,000 to construct an adequate post-office building for the city of Coleman, Tex., and an appropriation of $130,000 to erect a proper post-office building in the city of Sweetwater, Tex.

I am deeply grateful to and thank my colleagues for allowing these two appropriations to pass without objection. My worthy constituents who are citizens of these two enterprising cities duly appreciate this generous consideration shown them. They have patiently waited a long time for these public necessities.

This action today successfully terminates a long fight I have unceasingly waged for these two buildings ever since I first entered Congress, and especially since the Federal building program was resumed in the Sixty-ninth Congress. With my service that began March 4, 1917, in the Sixty-fifth or war Congress, all building activities were suspended for 10 years to permit the Government to recuperate from its enormous war expenses.

The people of Coleman and Sweetwater are greatly indebted to Senator SHEPPARD for the help he has so generously and untiringly given me in this matter. He has promptly responded each and every time I have called on him. He has several times left his arduous office work and gone with me to the Post Office Department to present in detail and argue at length the claims of Coleman and Sweetwater with Governor Bartlett, the then First Assistant Postmaster General. He has gone with me to the Treasury Department to see the then Assistant Secretary Schuneman and Supervising Architect Wetmore. Whenever I have called on him Senator SHEPPARD has immediately dropped everything and gone with me, lending me his time, aid, and help in every way possible.

When the proposal in the building program first came before us for Congress to delegate its power and authority to the Post Office and Treasury Departments to determine and say where new buildings should be located I was against that provision as I was afraid that politics would prevent a fair distribution of buildings to the various districts. Then I was definitely assured that both Coleman and Sweetwater would be placed in the building program. Hence, when S. 4663, carrying the new building program, was passed in the House on February 7, 1927, under suspension of rules I supported and spoke for it, then calling attention to the fact that my promised buildings had been assured. Likewise, when H. R. 278 was passed by the House on December 17, 1927, under suspension of the rules, I spoke for it and again called attention to the fact that the assurance of buildings in Coleman and Sweetwater caused me to support the bill. My colleague [Mr. Hudspeth] then mentioned from the floor my getting the building for Sweetwater, and my colleague [Mr. Busby] then mentioned that I had opposed the proposition until I had been promised my two buildings.

On February 2, 1929, I spoke for 20 minutes in the House and called attention to the fact that I would soon retire from Congress and that the departments must keep faith with me and provide buildings for Coleman and Sweetwater. On February 27, 1929, buildings were duly allocated to Coleman and Sweetwater, which constituted authority for appropriations to be made therefor; and I retired from Congress 5 days later, on March 4, 1929. And I am happy to be back here today when we have voted the two specific appropriations for these buildings at Coleman and Sweetwater which assures their prompt construction. And so ends the usual long delays and Government redtape incident to all building construction.

PROUD OF SWEETWATER'S BUILDING

Every time I visit Sweetwater, I am proud of our Federal building there, but I am sad over the thought that my old true and tried friend, Morris B. Howard, did not live to enjoy it, for he passed away on February 15, 1931.

ONE OF THE BEST POSTMASTERS IN THE UNITED STATES

Hon. Morris B. Howard was one of the most efficient postmasters in the Nation. Service to the people with a smile was his motto. He was their obliging servant. And while he was a Republican appointee he was also a good Democrat. I have before me the official records showing that during the Bryan campaign in 1908 he made a contribution to the Democratic National Committee, and when Bryan was defeated he made a contribution toward the campaign deficit to our Democratic National Committee.

And in the Woodrow Wilson-Thomas R. Marshall campaign in 1912 I have before me the official records showing that he made a contribution to our Democratic National Committee on September 14, 1912, and another on October 5, 1912, and to help pay off the campaign deficit he made another contribution on November 8, 1912, and another one on November 26, 1912, to our Democratic National Committee.

MORRIS HOWARD'S DAUGHTER

During the last three or four campaigns I have made there is no other friend in my district who has done more for me than Mrs. Thelma Howard Bowen. She has made trips to many counties, contacting her friends and their friends in my behalf. When I was 2,000 miles away in Washington she has taken down the speeches made by my opponents and furnished me with transcripts of same. Friendship caused it all. She expected no reward, and never allowed me to return any expense to her. Regarding her service to the Democratic Party I will quote the following from the Sweetwater Daily Reporter of April 10, 1935:

I have in my files a copy of a letter which in 1912 Mrs. Woodrow Wilson wrote Thelma Howard, then a little girl, addressing her as "My dear little friend", and thanking her for her action in selling a painting and sending the President the money as her contribution to the Democratic national campaign. She made an additional contribution in Woodrow Wilson's campaign fund, for in my files is a copy of the following letter written to her just after the election, by President Woodrow Wilson, to wit:

TRENTON, N. J., November 15, 1912.

Miss THELMA HOWARD,
Sweetwater, Tex.

MY DEAR LITTLE FRIEND: I cannot tell you what gratification that it gives me that you should think of me. Your letter has given me a great deal of genuine pleasure and I hope that as the years go on you will continue to feel that I am the sort of man you would like to support and keep as your friend.

Cordially and faithfully yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

In the Franklin D. Roosevelt campaign in 1932 Mrs. Thelma Howard Bowen gave her money, time, and efforts in doing everything that it was possible for one woman to do in helping him to be elected. I have in my files copies of correspondence between her and Hon. Robert W. Haynie, who was national Democratic chairman for my congressional district, showing that she served under him as one of the organizers for Nolan County, sold Democratic medallions, and helped to raise funds for the Democratic National Committee.

TYPICAL OF HER SERVICE

The following letter from Judge Robert W. Haynie, district Democratic chairman, evidences the confidence he had in her valuable service:

ABILENE, TEX., October 18, 1932.

MRS. THELMA HOWARD BOWEN,
Box No. 786, Sweetwater, Tex.

DEAR MRS. BOWEN: As national Democratic campaign chairman for the Seventeenth Congressional District of Texas, I am appointing you as cochairman for Nolan County, to work with the Democratic county chairman as organizer for your county. We do this in recognition of the valuable services you have already rendered our cause, and we know that you will render some very efficient and valuable work for the Democratic Party between now and the November election. Mrs. John Perry, of Sweetwater, Tex., is a member of the executive committee for the Seventeenth Congressional District, and I would suggest that you get in touch with her and render her all assistance possible in the organization of Nolan County. It is the purpose of our executive committee to organize every precinct in every county, and for that purpose a woman's committee composed of a cochairman and two other members has been deemed advisable. I would suggest that you select two other workers to work with you as members of your committee and furnish me with the names of the coworkers.

Assuring you that we will appreciate any service that you can give us, and with best regards,

Yours truly,

R. W. HAYNIE, Chairman.

ARE THERE ANY CITIZENS IN SWEETWATER UNGRATEFUL?

For 18 years I have done faithful service for Sweetwater. No Congressman could have given more devoted service to any city in his district than I have to Sweetwater. I have answered thousands of letters for Sweetwater people. I have handled scores of departmental cases here for them with the Government. I have promptly looked after all of their passport matters. I have given prompt attention to all of their numerous income-tax problems they have had here with the Internal Revenue Bureau. I have seen to it that Sweetwater got her share of public works and relief funds. I got for Sweetwater her C. C. C. camp, when numerous other places in my district were clamoring for it. And when through a mistake of the Governor at Austin approving of such transfer, without Sweetwater agreeing to it, and a unit of Negroes were sent to the camp there, and Sweetwater officials telephoned and wired me urging that they be removed, I worked day and night until I got them removed, and I have a promise from the President of the United States, and Director Fechner, and Director Cammerer, that a white unit will be returned to Sweetwater camp within the next few months.

NOTHING BEATS COOPERATION

On assuming the duties of acting postmaster, Mrs. Bowen asked for the friendly cooperation of the patrons, and in return she promised them the very best service with a smile. That is the kind of cooperation I want from Mayor Armor—like R. G. Armor, of Eden, gave me—and from Hon. W. H. Jobe, and the ones who pulled off that free "bean feed" and the able editor of the influential Daily Reporter, and then I shall be better able to do all of the things worth while for Sweetwater.

ADDRESS BY HON. SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL AT STUDEBAKER REORGANIZATION DINNER

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, our colleague, Hon. SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL, delivered a notable address, beautiful in its diction and sound in its philosophy, at the Studebaker reorganization dinner in South Bend, Ind., on Friday evening, April 26. Studebaker, founded in 1852, and therefore starting its eighty-third year, is the first great industry to be reorganized under legislation sponsored by the Roosevelt administration, and is, I am told, the only automobile company that ever went into a receivership and came out. The dinner, held in the dining room at Notre Dame University, was attended by 1,400 guests, including representatives of the entire automotive industry, automobiles and accessories. Among those who spoke at the dinner were Alvin Macauley, president of the Automobile Manufacturers' Association; Robert Lincoln O'Brien, Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission; Gov. Paul V. McNutt, of Indiana; Dr. R. D. Morand, deputy speaker of the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada; Thomas W. Slick, judge of the United States district court; Herald S. Vance, chairman of the board of directors, and Paul G. Hoffman, president, of the Studebaker Corporation.

Our distinguished colleague, Mr. PETTENGILL, chose as his subject, The Automotive Industry and National Recovery. The address he delivered is so obviously illuminating in its adherence to correct principles and is withal so inspiring that I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. PETTENGILL'S address follows:

THE AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY AND NATIONAL RECOVERY

My friends, I have long since come to the conclusion that it is not the function of men in public office to act as "cheer leaders." They should be neither pessimists nor optimists, but men willing to state the truth as they see it and face all the facts, whatever they are, good or bad. This was the way a great American dealt with the public. In Abraham Lincoln's second inaugural address, after 4 years of war, he spoke of the "progress of our arms", which he trusted was "reasonably satisfactory and encouraging." But he added these words: "With high hope for the future no prediction with regard to them is ventured." Lincoln was not a dealer in ballyhoo.

Nevertheless, the cold facts which have brought this meeting together seem to warrant a "high hope for the future." A great industry which has seen hard times come and go in its 83 years of useful life has again weathered the storm. Its confidence in the future is as strong as its pride in its past.

The outcome must renew the fighting faith, not only of those of us of South Bend, but of all American industry, that we are climbing the hill. I congratulate Judge Slick, Mr. Vance, Mr. Hoffman, and those who gambled their dollars upon the goodwill of the Studebaker name and the good workmanship of the Studebaker car.

Sixty-eight years ago, only 3 years after Lincoln's death, Studebaker carried this advertisement:

"Founded in 1852 with willing hands and stout hearts, but no capital, we have struggled upward, overcoming all discouragements, until today we employ 130 hands. Let our works praise us; we ask no other endorsement. We claim to be unsurpassed in excellence of workmanship and material. And we make our prices such that no prudent man will claim to undersell us. On this base we plant our flag, and here we propose to fight to the end."

Thank God, the end is not yet—not even the beginning of the end. It is the ending of the beginning! Studebaker carries on!

No segment of our business life has shown greater courage than the automobile industry. It was a chief factor in pulling us out of the let-down following the World War, and it leads the way today. Upon its success in the days to come depends in large part the happiness of us all. It has brought the country to the city, and the city to God's out-of-doors. It has laid its ribbons of concrete from ocean to ocean. It has broken down barriers between the States. Following the iron horse across the continent, it has helped to make this Nation a "more perfect Union." It has brought us into closer and friendlier relations with the "Lady of the Snows" to the north, and to our neighbors south of the Rio Grande, and in lands beyond the sea.

It has made a notable contribution to the American farm. Cars are grown as well as made. Soy beans are used to paint them, and into their making go millions of pounds of cotton, millions of pounds of wool and mohair from sheep and goats, millions of bushels and pounds of corn, flax, sugar, cane, cattle, and hogs, for rubber substitute, solvents, glycerine, antifreeze, antirust, glue, greases, bristles, butyl alcohol, oleic acid, lubricants, plastic materials, and upholstery. The American farm has found a new market in our cities, and our cities in turn, with the revival of agriculture, will find new markets on the farm.

This ought to teach us that we can no longer afford to be provincial and narrow in our attitudes toward problems facing any part of American life. The farm is the problem of industry, and the success of the latter will in turn be to the welfare of the former.

The automobile industry employs directly and indirectly some 3,900,000 wage earners, or one-tenth of the total gainfully employed of the Nation. The beat of its mighty heart is felt in every artery of commerce. It buys 80 percent of the world's rubber, 85 percent of our petroleum, plateglass 38 percent, iron and steel 15 percent, copper 11 percent, aluminum 25 percent, nickel 28 percent, lumber 14 percent, lead 10 percent, etc. Automobiles pay 11 percent of the total cost of government, or over a billion dollars a year, and this does not include property and income taxes on automobile factories, machinery, garages, etc. Although it competes with railroads, it furnishes 14 percent of all railroad freight. Every human being under the American flag could get into the 24,000,000 motor vehicles now in use and ride on rubber at the same instant of time. Placed end to end, American-owned cars would go twice around the globe. This miracle of achievement is not the product of government or bureaucracy. It is the result of private enterprise. When Mussolini or Stalin do half as much, it will be twice as much as they have done.

Cars are made by money, management, and men. Each is a leg of a three-legged stool. Money is the accumulated surplus of past labor, and management is a form of present labor. The future success of American industry and the continued welfare of those who invest their savings in it depends upon viewing the whole problem in terms of human happiness for 125,000,000 Americans. Millionaires cannot absorb the products of our factories. Mass production is meaningless without mass distribution. And mass distribution is impossible without money in the pockets of the masses with which to buy. As a leader in the automobile industry has recently said, "Our only market is our people. I believe that wages will continue to go higher, not as a result of politics or from humanitarian motives, but as a result of the kind of management that will enable men to earn more", so that they can buy more.

It seems to me that industrial prosperity must be rebuilt upon the demonstrated fact that dollars cannot long earn dividends if workers do not earn wages; that every time industry lays off a laborer it loses a customer.

When an automobile goes in the ditch it is seldom the fault of the car, especially if it is a Studebaker car. It is the fault of the driver. Our present difficulties are not the fault of the machine age but the way we have failed to manage the machine age. We must become social engineers as well as automobile engineers. We have been too engrossed with the problems of production. We must now concern ourselves with the problem of distribution.

The savings of labor-saving machinery have gone, too, largely to the owners of the machine and to consumers in reduced selling prices. The men the machines displace are the ones we must think about in the days to come.

For a hundred years the working day has been getting shorter, both on the farm and in the factory. And for many years the industrial dead line has been reached at a younger period of life. In addition, the percentage of the aged to the total population has been increasing. Since 1910 the proportion of those over 65 has increased 34 percent. It is estimated by the actuaries for the great life-insurance companies that within 35 years the number of our people over 50 years of age will be greater than those under 20 years of age. Those in middle life will find the problem of supporting their parents greater than that of supporting their children.

Meantime the machine age marches on. The photoelectric cell, now in its infancy, has a greater possibility of displacing human labor than anything so far dreamed of.

These new problems require industrial statesmanship of the highest order. I take heart by observing everywhere the recognition that we are at the frontiers of a new world of science and human relationships. Somehow we must set up on the books of industry, under the safeguards of Government, a charge to create reserves against unemployment and old age, and thus distribute the savings of labor-saving machinery over the entire circle of life.

These reserves will tend to maintain purchasing power and thus soften the peaks and dips of the economic curve. In the 4 years from 1930 to 1933 we distributed $21,000,000,000 of dividends to the owners of industry, $17,000,000,000 representing reserves from the profits of previous years. It was a sum far greater than that spent in relief, public works, and the R. F. C. I am glad the reserves were set up in fat years to be spent in lean years. But in the same way we must set up similar reserves against loss of wages in slack times and to provide for the "human obsolescence" of old age.

In so doing enlightened and farsighted industrial management must be protected against their chiselling competitors, who by increasing hours and decreasing wages so reduce their costs that they steal the markets of those who would play the game. N. R. A. has been too complicated, has attempted too many things, but whatever we call the statute, half-a-dozen of its basic principles need to be preserved. America must not and will not go back to competitive wage cutting, to child labor, and the sweat shop. If we attempt it we will go into another tail-spin with a complete crash or a dictator at the bottom.

I refuse to believe there is an inevitable conflict between capital and labor. On the contrary, it is an inescapable partnership. Labor knows that capital must be assured a fair return because frightened dollars mean idle men. Nor can costs advance so fast that consumers are driven to other markets. Nevertheless the whole future of industry depends on the base of the economic pyramid and its increasing participation in the fruits of American enterprise. We can preserve the profit system if we pass the profits around and do not permit them to be siphoned off in watered stocks and bogus bonds.

All this requires time. Rome was not built in a day. Mistakes will be made and patience is necessary.

But we are sailing toward a new world, and if the light of the stars be sometimes dim, we will go on nevertheless. This is the way our fathers came and it is the way that we shall go.

We shall go on with the spirit of those who poured over the slopes of the Appalachians a century ago to build this empire of the west. It was said of them at the time that the "cowards never started and the weak never arrived." By the thousands they died of ague, malaria, and typhoid. They faced the Indian and the panther and the rattlesnake. They heard on winter nights the wolves' long howl. They faced the perils of the wilderness, the cold of winter, and the hunger and thirst of the desert. They dallied with danger as a she tiger fondles her young. But they never thought of turning back. They kept coming on! They did not go running to Washington every time the covered wagon broke an axle or the wheels stuck in the mud. They had the virtues of the pioneer—fortitude, self-denial, self-reliance, self-command, self-respect—the old virtues which made this Nation great and which alone can keep her great. Their blood, thank God, still flows in our veins.

To close with Lincoln's phrase, "We can indeed have high hopes for the future."

With our raw materials, our marvelous inventive genius, our technology, our power, our trained management, and our skilled labor we can produce beyond the dreams of want. We do not need to go without to decrease production. We must increase it and distribute it.

All we need to be added to what we have is the spirit of the Golden Rule in human relationships and thus bequeath to our children and our children's children the security of happy homes and the institutions for which our fathers died.

PERSONAL INJURY AND DEATH CLAIMS ARISING IN COUNTRIES OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a letter and enclosures from the Secretary of State, suggesting the enactment of legislation authorizing the Secretary of State, in his discretion and in furtherance of the international relations of the United States, to determine, adjust, and settle personal-injury and death claims against the United States arising in countries in which the United States exercises privileges of extraterritoriality.

I am heartily in accord with the proposal as outlined by the Secretary of State, and I recommend that the Congress enact legislation, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State, to make it effective.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 2, 1935.

EXAMPLES OF JAPANESE IMPORTS COMPETING IN THE DOMESTIC MARKET WITH COMPARABLE AMERICAN MERCHANDISE AND WHICH HAVE A RETARDING EFFECT ON INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend, as a part of my remarks, a list of examples of Japanese imports competing in domestic markets with comparable American merchandise, which have a very retarding effect on industrial recovery. Many Members of the House, Mr. Speaker, have asked me to put this list in the RECORD. I showed many of the Japanese imports on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the lady from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following examples of Japanese imports competing in the domestic market with comparable American merchandise:

MICROSCOPE

American:
Wholesale price	$7.50
Retail price	12.50
(Magnifies 150 times.)
German microscope of similar design, wholesale selling price	3.50
Retails at	5.00
(Magnifies 100 times.)

MICROSCOPE—continued

Japanese:
- Foreign wholesale selling price $0.61
- Landed wholesale price, duty paid 1.25
- Retails in Boston, Mass., at 1.95

(Double lens, magnifies 150 times, lenses detachable. packed in wooden case.)

CIGARETTE BOXES

(Exact design—made from mold taken from American article.)

American:
- Production cost—labor and material only $1.55
- Wholesale selling price 2.28
- Retail price 4.00

Japanese:
- Foreign wholesale selling price ..... .17⅓
- Retail price here ..... .39

CANDY DISH

(Piracy of design)

American:
- Wholesale price $3.25
- Retails from (silver plated) 5–5.50

Japanese:
- Foreign wholesale selling price 0.23
- Retailed in Baltimore for ..... .59

FLASH LIGHTS

(Exact copies)

American:
- Wholesale price, with lamp but without battery $0.19
- Retails with batteries for ..... .59

Japanese:
- Foreign wholesale selling price without battery ..... .01¼
- Landed price, duty paid ..... .0194
- Retails here, with battery ..... .39

HEAVY BRASS DOUBLE-ACTION HINGES

American: Wholesale price, per pair (in cast brass) $3.50

Japanese:
- Foreign wholesale price, per pair ..... .55
- Landed price, duty paid 1.25

(Partly laminated sheet brass, spot welded.)

ASH TRAYS

(Piracy of design but of baser metal)

American: Retail price (sterling silver) $4.00

Japanese:
- Foreign wholesale selling price ..... .26⅔
- Retail price here (with glass liner) ..... .59

NOTE.—Production cost in this country in white metal with no allowance for profit and distribution is 61 cents.

TRIPLE-SHELL BON-BON DISH

(Piracy of design, not comparable in material)

American:
- Wholesale price (silver plated) $2.00
- Retail price 3.50

Japanese:
- Foreign wholesale selling price ..... .39¼
- Retailed in Baltimore at 1.00

(Probably an alloy of reclaimed metal and antimony.)

THERMOS BOTTLE

(One pint)

American:
- Cost of production $0.4742
- Retail price ..... .79

Japanese:
- Foreign wholesale value ..... .11⅔
- Landed, duty paid at ..... .35
- Retails here at ..... .59

HOT-WATER BOTTLES

American:
- Cost of production $0.33
- Retails in chain stores at ..... .50

Japanese:
- Foreign wholesale value ..... .07
- Landed, duty paid at ..... .16½
- Retails, chain stores ..... .23

TOOTHBRUSHES

(Many of the brushes copy the special designs of our manufacturers)

American:
- Wholesale price, per gross $14.40
- Wholesale price, each ..... .10
- Retail price, from 0.35–.50

Japanese:
- Foreign wholesale price, each ..... .01½
- Landed cost, duty paid ..... .04⅝

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by printing an address delivered by our colleague, Hon. THEODORE CHRISTIANSON, of Minnesota, in Boston on April 30, and also to further extend my remarks by printing an address delivered by our colleague, Hon. JESSE P. WOLCOTT, of Michigan, in Boston on April 29.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]?

There was no objection.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY—ITS RESPONSIBILITY AND OPPORTUNITY

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Honorable THEODORE CHRISTIANSON, of Minnesota, at the New England Regional Republican Conference at Boston, on Tuesday, April 30, 1935:

I come as a representative of the Middle West, bearing greetings to the Republicans of New England. I bring you assurance that the people of the prairie country, who organized the Republican Party and gave Abraham Lincoln to the Nation, stand ready to join with you in returning the responsibility of government to that party, revitalized by his spirit and rededicated to the constructive liberalism which he exemplified.

Sometime we of the West have regarded you of the East as too conservative, and I understood that at times you have considered us too radical. In order to avoid an argument, we might agree that there has been some justification for each of these points of view. While there have been in my part of the country some who were disposed to step too hard on the accelerator, there have been in yours some who have formed the habit of too frequently applying the brakes; but a vast majority of the people, East and West, realize that in the long run we shall make the fastest and safest progress by using both accelerator and brakes; and it is to that majority, which recognizes that adventurous daring and prudent caution are not antagonistic but complementary, that the Republican Party makes its appeal.

I can make my meaning clear by quoting what that straight-thinking son of New England, Calvin Coolidge, said 2 decades ago: "Expect to be called a standpatter, but don't be a standpatter. Expect to be called a radical, but don't be a radical. Dare to be as revolutionary as science, dare to be as conservative as the multiplication table."

If it were at all possible to epitomize any statement that Coolidge ever uttered, I should say that the aim of the Republican Party, and of the American people, today should be not radicalism, nor conservatism, but realism.

One of the basic reasons for our present muddled situation is that our statesmen, or those who have posed as such, have been disposed to think in terms of words rather than ideas. We have been literally drowned in abstractions. We have had the new freedom, the new era, and the new deal. Sometime the ultimate meaning of high-sounding but equivocal slogans has turned out to be something different from what we were led to anticipate. The world was to be "made safe for democracy", whatever that means, but the only countries where democracy is really safe today are those in which it has been embalmed and buried. The "forgotten man" was to be given a "more abundant life", and the abundance presumably was obtained by killing 6,000,000 pigs and plowing under every third row of cotton.

We have had words, words, and more words. If words could save us, we wouldn't need redemption. But circumlocution, although a convenient device for evading issues, does not solve any problems; it does not butter bread or repair the roof.

I realize fully that it is dangerous to be specific; but one of these days someone will have to begin to specify. Let it be acknowledged that specifications must be in a measure tentative, must be subject to revision; but let us, as a party and as a people, nevertheless get down to definite proposals, for where nothing is proposed there is nothing even to revise.

Although I fully recognize that the economic problem which today engages our attention is complex and that there is danger involved in trying to resolve it into a too simple equation, I feel that the very complexity of the problem makes it necessary to strip it of its excrescences and to get down to a few basic facts.

The depression which has been with us for more than 5 years differs in some of the details of its pattern from other similar visitations, but it has one thing in common with them. Fundamentally its cause is a debt structure that has gotten out of balance with the people's ability to pay. We are "hard up" because we owe too much. When we eat too much we get indigestion; when we invest too much we get another kind of stomachache. The greater the excesses into which we have been persuaded by the cooks in the economic kitchen the longer it takes us to recover; and if we follow the prescription of a doctor who, like the one in the White House, tells us that the cure for the after-effects of too much debt is more debt, then, I fear, someone, after the autopsy has been performed, will have to record that "the treatment was successful, but unfortunately the patient died."

Read the history of 1837, of 1857, of 1873, and of 1893 and you will find the story of 1929 anticipated in each case with startling parallelism. Leading up to every depression is a rising price level, representing recovery from a previous crisis. When the upward trend becomes discernible those who make it their practice to follow graphs and charts begin to buy lands, commodities, securities. Later the school teacher, the cab driver, and the barber get the idea that they, too, can ride in on the rising tide. Everybody begins to speculate.

In the Middle West we bought farm lands, bidding against each other and raising the price to two, three, four, five, and even six hundred dollars an acre. Later we engaged in competition with you, and succeeded in lifting Cities Service to more than $60 a share. We did not stop when we had put up as ante all the money we had; we mortgaged our future earnings, and increased the Nation's debts, public and private, to an unprecedented total. We inflated our toy balloon with the hot air of credit, until in October 1929 it burst and hit us in the face.

Prices tumbled, incomes declined, equities were wiped out. Everything shrank, except the debts we had contracted, and taxes and other fixed charges, most of which were related directly or indirectly to debts. It was the inelasticity of the debt structure and the failure of fixed charges to follow prices downward that caused the depression.

If fixed charges, including interest, taxes, and transportation costs could have been reduced in the proportion in which general prices and incomes had declined, a readjustment would have been accomplished without any prolonged distress, for people can be just as prosperous on a low as on a high price level, if the decline is uniform along the entire economic front. When prices and incomes drop in one sector but not in another there follows a dislocation which leaves the buying power of large groups of people paralyzed.

Let us consider more specifically one of the fixed charges which I have mentioned—that of interest. There is no way to ascertain definitely the exact amount of the indebtedness, public and private, of the American people, and the average rate of interest it bears. The amount has been estimated at from $150,000,000,000 to $250,000,000,000. Inasmuch as variation in figures would not affect the validity of the argument I am about to make, let us assume an indebtedness of $200,000,000,000 and an average interest rate of 5 percent. In 1929 the aggregate income of the people was $85,000,000,000. Out of that income those who were in debt had to take $10,000,000,000 for interest. To the extent that those who received the $10,000,000,000 either spent it or reinvested it in the Nation's physical plant, the existence of the debt burden left the buying power of the people as a whole unimpaired.

But by 1933 the Nation's income had fallen to $39,000,000,000. The debt-carrying cost remained at $10,000,000,000. The difference between the national income and the total of interest payments had shrunk from $75,000,000,000 to $29,000,000,000—almost two-thirds—in 4 years. It is not strange, in view of that shrinkage, that ten or twelve million men lost their jobs; indeed, it is strange that the economic machine did not entirely stop running. For the debtor group, with the margin between income and interest obligations so sharply narrowed, had to reduce spending to a bare subsistence level in order to save its equities; and the creditor group, finding that the buying power of its income had been so increased by lower prices that more wants would have to be created if all its interest income were to be spent, and becoming at the same time so infected with fear as to cause it instead to retrench, proceeded to hoard. The amount that was hoarded roughly measures the extent of the reduction in spending which followed when, and because, debt charges failed to come down with prices and incomes.

When Mr. Roosevelt became President (and you will note, parenthetically, that I do not hesitate to commit lese majesty by naming him) two courses of procedure were open to him. He might have forced an adjustment of fixed charges to the new price level, or he might have tried, in defiance of the world-wide trend, to raise domestic prices to the level which existed when the debt structure was created. The former procedure, which was followed in Australia with such success that that Commonwealth climbed four-fifths of the way out of the depression, apparently was too simple; it was too direct; it was too unspectacular; it did not lend itself to the fanfare that must signalize America's emergence. So it was rejected.

To be sure, an initial step toward a balanced Budget and the reduction of fixed charges was taken when the economy bill was passed; but, having saved half a billion dollars by trimming 15 percent from the wages of Government employees and by ruthlessly removing disabled veterans from the compensation rolls, the President, wielding his lash over a supine Congress, forced it to vote the largest peace-time Budget in the history of the Government. When Members of Congress sought to amend the Constitution so as to permit the taxation of income derived from Federal, State, and municipal bonds, and thereby in effect to reduce the annual interest charge on public indebtedness by $400,000,000, the bills embodying the proposed amendment were chloroformed in committee at the demand of an administration which feared that the measure would interfere with the flotation of additional billions of Government obligations.

Having rejected the processes which had brought us out of every former depression, the President proceeded to formulate a novel and spectacular program. He committed himself wholly to the theory that recovery can be accomplished by lifting prices, and that the way to lift prices is to create artificial scarcity. With the idea that it is desirable to bring production back into balance when, because of temporary and more or less artificial causes, the supply of certain products has become disproportionate to the demand, I have no quarrel.

As an emergency measure, the Agricultural Adjustment Act—I am speaking now of the measure itself and not of its administration—had much to commend it. We in the Middle West were induced during the war to increase the acreage devoted to wheat and corn. We expanded our normal agricultural area by putting under plow lands that formerly had been devoted to grazing. After the war ended we found ourselves in possession of a plant too large and too highly geared to produce for our normal market. Furthermore, the shift in the debtor-creditor relationship between Europe and America and the determination of almost every European country to raise as much of its own food as possible in order to be better prepared for future emergencies, deprived the American farmer of markets he had normally enjoyed. The need to adjust the Nation's agricultural economy to a new situation brought about by the war and in part by the farmer's activity in helping to win it, placed upon the Government a definite responsibility—a responsibility which justified the imposition of processing taxes on wheat, corn, and hogs.

But let it be understood that the Agricultural Adjustment program must be regarded as being, not a final solution of the farm problem but, as the very name implies, a device for bridging an emergency. Although I come from the West and am naturally sympathetic with its aspirations, I am realistic enough to sense that the voting power of millions of consumers may not for always support the policy of subsidizing scarcity.

Certainly the general public will rebel, and should rebel, against the administration's indefensible policy of wantonly destroying food for which hungry mouths are crying. But my criticism of the party in power is directed not so much at the stupid and even immoral things it did in the execution of its agricultural program as at its failure to take a single step toward the ultimate solution of one of the Nation's most important problems.

The future of agriculture in this country calls for increased, not reduced production. It calls for the development of markets rather than for restriction of output. If we would develop markets, we must, as an initial step, make the farmer secure in his home market. This, I charge, the administration has not even tried to do. In fact, it has resisted and obstructed every effort made to protect American agriculture against the invasion of foreign products. Last year Congress placed an excise tax on coconut oil. The President not only tried to induce Members of Congress from agricultural States to vote against a levy which their constituents demanded, but, failing, he secured from his subordinates an interpretation of the tax provision which evaded its plain meaning and in part nullified what Congress had sought to do. At this very time the Secretary of State is conducting negotiations which, if information seeping in from the North is correct, threaten Maine potatoes and Minnesota wheat. Because of the President's failure to take appropriate action, rye and barley have been coming into this country from Poland; flax, corn, and beef from Argentina; cattle from Canada and Mexico; and butter from New Zealand, Holland, and Denmark.

At the present time there is pending in Congress a bill sponsored by the Secretary of Agriculture, which provides for reducing the duty on flax by 50 percent, and compensates for the tariff reduction by imposing a processing tax. The proponents of this measure carefully conceal from the farmer that after the duty has been cut in two, there remains with the administration the power to cut it in two again, thus lowering the wall against foreign flax by 75 percent. If this measure passes, as it probably will, Argentine farmers will be given an opportunity to supply the American market with flax seed that could, and should, be raised on American acres withdrawn from wheat.

When we permit agricultural products of kinds that we can raise at home to come in from abroad, and at the same time pay the American farmer for reducing acreage devoted to such products, we in effect tax the consumer to subsidize foreign production. I do not believe that either the farmer or the consumer will long tolerate that procedure.

Forty-five years ago James G. Blaine, then Secretary of State, foresaw the present plight of agriculture and pointed out the remedy. While the McKinley bill was under consideration he declared:

"I do not doubt that in many respects the tariff bill pending in the Senate is a just measure and that most of its provisions are in accordance with the wise policy of protection. But there is not a paragraph or a line in the entire bill that will open the market for another bushel of wheat or another barrel of pork. If sugar is now placed on the free list without exacting important trade concessions in return, we shall close the door for a profitable reciprocity against ourselves. * * * Our free market for breadstuffs grows narrower. Great Britain is exerting every nerve to secure her bread supply from India, and the rapid expansion of the wheat area in Russia gives us a powerful competitor in the markets of Europe. It becomes us, therefore, to use every opportunity for the extension of our market on both of the American continents. * * * Our field of commercial development and progress lies south of us."

Blaine was of New England, but he recognized that industrial New England could not be prosperous unless the buying power of the agricultural West was sustained, and he believed that that buying power could best be sustained by developing a market for wheat and pork in tropical America. Instead of lowering the duty on South American products, as the present administration has done and proposes to do, he advised raising it in order to secure leverage with which to obtain trade concessions. We could do no better than to adopt the sound policy which Blaine proposed almost half a century ago, rejecting the haphazard method by which, in star-chamber sessions, the present Secretary of State is trading away vital American interests, and substituting therefor a procedure by which, within limits defined by law, and after full hearing of all interested parties, open covenants might be "openly arrived at." Let Brazil take our wheat and pork in exchange for her coffee; let other nations find here a free market for their rubber, silk, sisal, tea, cacao, and other noncompetitive agricultural products, but only upon the condition that they accept in return those of our commodities which they do not produce; and, finally, bar from our markets all competitive products from abroad, and the American farmer will manage to get along without a processing tax.

The broadening of the agricultural market by selective bipartite agreements, uncomplicated by "favored-nation" clauses would in a large measure solve the unemployment problem, for it would make it possible for several million people who in the last decade have left rural communities and moved into the crowded industrial centers to return to the soil. For that reason—speaking, I admit, with the bias of agriculture—I believe that the industrial communities would be best served hereafter by granting to the farmer the first call on the export market. The post-war policy of continuing, by imprudent loans and other artificial means, an abnormal demand for our industrial goods abroad, while the home market was allowed to atrophy, was, from the standpoint of industry's own long-range interests, not only unwise but wellnigh disastrous.

Society, originating in an agricultural economy, has been modified with the passing of time by industrial development; but always the foundation of stable and enduring states has been the prosperity of the tillers of the soil. It is the glory of America that its industrialism has brought comforts and ease to Americans everywhere; but the obvious limitations of industry are, in the long run, largely in the service of our national needs. Industrializing the Nation beyond that point, in an endeavor to spread industrial goods throughout the world, instantly puts our people into competition with the 10-cent labor of China and Japan. Exchanging agricultural surpluses with foreign countries may be definitely considered as much sounder, with all the facts of our national economy in view, than destroying by further industrial development the basis upon which our Nation has grown great.

Now I come to a subject in which, I know, New England is directly interested—the processing tax on cotton. While a curtailment program, wisely administered, was justified as a temporary expedient to reduce the yield of food products—the overproduction of which was within manageable limits—no such justification can be claimed for the reduction of the acreage devoted to a crop which, unless a large part of the agricultural South is to be liquidated, must always look abroad for one-half its market. The southern farmer does not wish to reduce his production to an amount even approximately approaching domestic requirements; in fact, he knows that such a curtailment would spell bankruptcy throughout a territory extending from the Carolinas to Texas. Consequently the processing tax as applied to cotton becomes merely a device by which, in return for the privilege of charging the domestic cotton-spinner more for his raw material, the cotton farmer surrenders his foreign market to Brazil, Egypt, and India. Such a policy, from the standpoint of the South, is not only harmful; it is suicidal. I think it was Will Rogers who said that one of the wisest statesmen the South has produced for a generation was the Texas mule that refused to tramp down every third row of cotton.

We in the West are concerned with the plight of your textile industry, as you are concerned when the winds sweep the topsoil off our fertile prairies, for we know that a cotton mill with doors locked and windows boarded up is generally as fully lost to a community as soil fertility that has been blown away. Some men in high places have made light of your problem. They have said, among other things, that the amount of cotton cloth imported from Japan is negligible. That statement begs the question, for it is not the amount imported that worries you, but the accelerated increase in imports and their effect upon the price structure. The condition of the textile industry calls for action. The Cotton Control Act should be repealed and there should be imposed a virtual embargo, by tariff duties or otherwise, on cotton cloth imported from any country that employs its labor at peon wages.

I note that you recently had a visit from the Secretary of Agriculture, and that, having mislaid his manuscript, he spoke with unwonted frankness. He said that you were "inefficient" and that you had lost your "rugged individualism." It seems somewhat inconsistent to complain that New England mills are inefficient when, according to the philosophy of the new deal, unemployment is due to the use of machines that have been too efficient in displacing labor. If the administration is sincere in its desire to put men back to work it should not insist on the installation of still more efficient machinery, which would deprive even more men of their jobs. The charge that you have lost your rugged individualism has, I find, evoked a response which proves that the spirit of Lexington and Bunker Hill still lives and that there are in these parts plenty of rugged individualists who do not hesitate to strike back at arrogant officialdom. The Secretary said that some of you are "interested primarily in hell-raising." If New England has rediscovered the efficacy of hell-raising, I would advise you to keep it up. In the Middle West we have been "raising hell" for some time and have found it pays.

I have spoken at some length on the Agricultural Adjustment Act and related legislation. Another bird hatched out of the Roosevelt recovery nest was the Blue Eagle. It boded no good that it came into the world misshapen, dismembered, and minus one extremity.

So long as it was up in the air it was a flamboyant figure, but when it got down to earth it limped on one foot. It had to be supported by P. W. A.

Like A. A. A., its alphabetical counterpart, N. R. A. was based on the economics of scarcity. It assumed that if things were made scarce enough they would become dear, and if they became dear enough people would buy them. Of course, that ran counter to all human experience, but so does the whole new deal. You are not expected to understand the new deal, you are expected to accept it. And if you don't accept it, somebody will crack down" on you. That is a part of the "new freedom!"

If the Republican Party has one responsibility more important, more urgent than any other, it is to destroy, once and for all time, the terrible philosophy that it is desirable to create scarcity. While there is still a single mouth to be fed, a single body to be clothed, a single family to be sheltered and a single home to be warmed, there is no justification for stopping production. We never have had, and we have not now, enough resources and equipment to supply every human want. Everyone of our 10,000,000 unemployed who is able and willing to work could be given 40 hours of employment a week, if people only had the incomes with which to buy what they produced. And in this lies the tragedy of N. R. A., that, in a Nation already suffering from too great a disparity between wealth and poverty, it set up codes which reduced the buying power of the people by causing prices to advance more than wages and thereby increased the disparity.

If you want one striking instance of what happens under the new deal, I would cite the case of the Reynolds Tobacco Co. Higher wages and shorter hours, required by N. R. A. codes, and the processing tax on tobacco, imposed by A. A. A., increased the company's costs $10,000,000. Thereupon the company raised wholesale prices $60,000,000. Then the President of the United States put the seal of his approval upon the transaction by appointing Clay Williams, president of the Reynolds Tobacco Co., as chairman of the N. R. A. Board.

The wise provisions of the antitrust law, enacted by a Republican Congress, have been set aside, and monopoly, drafting its own codes and making its own laws, is riding rough-shod over the American people. The industrial masters, about whom demagogues like to prate, and to curb whom was the avowed purpose of the new deal, have been permitted to write their own ticket. Doing business on a cost-plus basis, it makes little difference to them that labor costs are increased, when the rules are so changed that price competition is eliminated. They can well afford to give the working man another dollar if they in turn can take $2 away from him as a consumer. It does not irk the pork packer to pay a processing tax when he can charge the tax back to the farmer and also pass it on to the consumer, and declare the largest dividends in the history of his industry.

It is significant that during the first year the National Recovery Act was in force, the number of incomes of $10,000 or less dropped 5 percent, the number of incomes of $50,000 or more increased 10 percent, and the number of incomes of more than $1,000,000 jumped from 20 to 46. It is significant that from October 1933 to October 1934 the economic wage of the industrial worker dropped 2 percent despite all the trumpetings of General Johnson, and the number of unemployed increased 550,000. It is significant that now, after 2 years under the Blue Eagle, there are 20,500,000 names on the relief rolls of the Nation.

It would, of course, be wrong to say that the whole N. R. A. account is on the debit side of the ledger. Everybody approves of higher wages and shorter hours, of the abolition of child labor and the elimination of unfair competition. To the extent that these have been attained, they are admirable. But the losses charged up against these gains are so great that the net balance must be written in red ink. In exchange for the few gains we have paid too dear a price. We have had to give up cherished rights and abandon time-honored principles. To surrender these for material prosperity would be a questionable bargain, even if we got prosperity. Failing to get it, we must plead guilty to having been unfaithful as well as foolish stewards.

I cannot help but wonder how our Democratic friends feel about the way Thomas Jefferson has been scuttled. On one occasion he said, "I would rather be exposed to the inconveniences attending too much liberty than those attending too small a degree of it." I can believe that his dust would stir uneasily in his tomb at Monticello if he could know that men endowed with the inalienable rights of "life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness" have been arrested in this country for violating Executive orders that were not published or even filed, and that a tailor was put in jail for charging 35 cents instead of 40, presumably on the theory that pressing pants is interstate commerce.

I said that there are a few gains in N. R. A. that should be conserved. Such code provisions as are worth retaining should be written into the statutory law of the land, and their enforcement turned over to the Federal Trade Commission. The sophomores with Ph. D. degrees should be sent home. The antitrust laws, whose operation has been suspended by the so-called "Recovery Act", should be reinstated and enforced. The war against monopoly should be resumed. If the Republican Party in 1936 will raise as its issue the policies of Theodore Roosevelt against those of Franklin D. Roosevelt, it may with confidence await the verdict of the people.

The companion to N. R. A., as I have said, was P. W. A. By the very fact that it embarked on a program of Government spending, the administration admitted doubt as to the efficacy of its other recovery measures; failing to get the people to spend their own money voluntarily, the Government would take it from them and spend it for them. If the necessary funds could not be obtained from the present generation by taxation, they could be exacted from the voiceless and voteless unborn by issuing bonds payable by the next generation.

It must be confessed that the idea itself was not entirely new, even though the reason invented for justifying it was. We Republicans used to have the "pork barrel", and we showed our ineptitude by not finding a better name for it. We also failed to realize fully the possibilities of the idea. We built a few post offices, harbors, canals, roads, and other permanent and more or less useful structures, but we didn't put people to work "boondoggling" or conducting research into the history of the safety pin. We also made the mistake of being too conservative—too careful in the spending of other people's money. There have not been many instances of intentional frugality under the present regime, although it should perhaps be noted that Secretary Ickes has been accused of sabotaging the recovery program by being reasonably honest.

England some time ago undertook to "spend itself into prosperity", but gave it up. Recently the British Government stated officially, "The experiment of public works as a method of dealing with unemployment has been tried and has failed, and it is not intended to repeat it." Germany started a similar program, but abandoned it. We tried boot-strap lifting 2 years ago with a $3,300,000,000 appropriation, but without success; and we alone, among the nations of the world, are unwilling to learn from our past mistakes. As Republicans, we do not object to a reasonable amount of experimenting, but we want the experiments to be reasonable; and we demand that when experimentation has proved a policy to be ineffectual and even detrimental the administration refrain from continuing it. We insist that when a doctor, who does not know just what to prescribe, writes a gunshot prescription he at least leave out ingredients that may kill the patient. We have had enough trial and error, and too much error.

The President's so-called "Work Relief Act", passed at the present session, is the most astounding piece of legislation ever enacted by Congress. Under the guise of furnishing employment to 3,500,000 people, which our experience with P. W. A. proves it will not do, it places in the hands of the Chief Executive power which no one man should be permitted to exercise or should want to exercise in a country that calls itself a republic. The representatives of the people gave to the President blank checks on a $4,880,000,000 drawing account, thereby surrendering what the Anglo-Saxon people struggled to secure, from Magna Carta on—the control of the purse strings. The President can place that money where he wills, he can withhold it when he will, and by the exercise of the discretion to grant or to withhold he can bend Members of Congress to his pleasure. Holding the power of life and death over millions, saying who shall and who shall not have a job, he can if he chooses rule with the hand of a capricious despot. With $100,000,000 to spend in every State and more than $10,000,000 in every congressional district, he wields authority that should arouse the envy of all the dictators of Europe, including Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin.

Parenthetically, it is significant that the man whom the President appointed as chairman of the National Emergency Council, which the press describes as "the funnel through which all proposals for spending the * * * work fund are to be poured", is none other than Frank C. Walker, the treasurer of the Democratic National Committee. Thus it is provided that there shall be no division of responsibility in the handling of the two campaign funds—the one collected in the usual way and the one voted by Congress.

If we are to accept the word of one of the acknowledged spokesmen of the administration, we must assume that there is no intention that the latest works program shall be the last. Two years ago we were promised that P. W. A. was a temporary device, which would be abandoned after N. R. A. had brought forth its fruits. But a few days ago, when the second and enlarged program was launched, Professor Tugwell forecast that henceforth public works would constitute a "third economy", a permanent part of the economic system, and not merely an emergency-relief mechanism.

Is this the thing toward which America is tending; is this the goal toward which the administration is working—the separation of an increasing number of the people from private employment and their mobilization into a regular army of workers, bounden to the party in power? If so, the recent declaration of Justice McReynolds, which to many of us seemed far-fetched when he made it, may become invested with prophetic meaning.

The spending program of the administration will, if continued, inevitably result in a collapse of the Government's financial structure. Recently the country was shocked by the revelation that in the first 3 years under Roosevelt we shall spend as much money as was expended by all the Presidents from Washington to Wilson.

It was Ben Tillman who once said that "the Democratic wild donkeys break into green corn whenever they get into power." The present generation has had ample opportunity to learn the truth of that statement. First, Woodrow Wilson, who got himself reelected as President on the plea that he had "kept us out of war" and redeemed his implied promise in the approved Democratic way by putting us in, piled up a debt of $25,482,034,419, which his Republican successors, by hard work, were able to reduce to $16,185,308,299. Then came Roosevelt and increased the Federal debt to $28,817,458,097 for a starter. At the beginning of the present session, Congress raised the authorized debt limit to $45,000,000,000; which, with $20,000,000,000 of State and municipal indebtedness, will leave the American people with a total public debt of $65,000,000,000.

Lest in these days, when the people are wont to count even chicken feed in astronomical figures, there should be a failure to comprehend how much money $65,000,000,000 is, let me explain that it is approximately one-third the national wealth, in terms of present values. To pay that debt would call for six times the amount of gold and silver in the Federal Treasury. It would require a 5-mill tax on all the property of the American people for 130 years, assuming that the property were assessed for taxation at one-half its full and true value. And the proceeds of such a tax would not discharge the indebtedness, for during the 130 years interest would accrue in an amount several times the principal.

Donald Richberg, our assistant President, recently scouted the idea that the United States is headed for inflation. His assurance that the administration will not resort to the printing press is worth as much as the sound-money pledge in the last Democratic platform, and no more. The fact is that with relief rolls lengthening, with Federal spending proceeding at an accelerated rate, with the Government's credit already stretched beyond the limits of prudence, the time is approaching when printing money will be inevitable. The fact is that we already have inflation, although the process by which the currency is being inflated is so indirect and so well concealed that the general public is not aware of what is going on. I am not now referring to the devaluation of the dollar or to the administration's fatuous silver policy, but to the practice of making the Federal Reserve banks take the Government's bonds and issue Federal Reserve notes against them. Already almost one-half of the assets of the Federal Reserve banks consists of United States obligations. In order to make sure that the banks will continue to accept unending issues, the President is now trying to force through Congress a bill giving him control over the banking system. With the enactment of that measure the means of unlimited inflation will be at hand. The Treasury will issue bonds to the banks, the banks will issue currency against the bonds, and the result will be the same as if the Government issued currency directly. Presumably the notes will not carry the words "In God We Trust", although it might be appropriate if they did.

I do not criticize the President for reducing the gold content of the dollar, for I believe devaluation was a necessary expedient in a world of depreciated currencies to prevent the disappearance of our dwindling foreign trade; but I do criticize the President for withdrawing from the London Economic Conference and refusing to cooperate with other nations in the effort to stabilize currencies. When the Republican Party returns to power, one of its first moves should be to bring the governments of the principal commercial nations together to restore to their monetary units not their former gold values but their former relative values. Without such restoration there can be no real resumption of world trade. The dollar must be made stable again in order that the channels of domestic commerce may be reopened. It is idle to hope for that return of confidence which is essential to business recovery if men cannot know today, with reasonable certainty, what money will be worth a year hence or 10 years hence. It is perhaps not important whether the future dollar is a 59-cent dollar or a 50-cent dollar, provided that it is real money and not "make-believe."

It is not my purpose this evening to be so presumptuous as to present a platform for the Republican Party. Our program will be formulated next year at the Republican National Convention. But it is not too early, at this and other regional conferences, to consider issues and to present views upon them, so that gradually, by a process of sifting, there may be developed a body of opinion that will furnish the basis for our deliberations next summer.

Some have expressed the thought that our opponents have made the issue for us, and that we can rest our case on Democratic derelictions. While what I have said should leave no doubt as to my opinion of the record of the administration, it is my conviction that we must offer to the people more than an indictment of our opponents. The voters will expect us to advance an affirmative and not merely a negative program. They will want to know what we purpose to do, when we return to power, to lift the country out of the present economic morass. They will want to know whether we are statesmen seeking to serve the Nation or merely opportunists trying to serve ourselves. Let assurance be given that when confronted by new problems, the Republican Party will not hesitate, without departing from its basic principles, to enlarge its traditional program and to review its ancient tenets in the light of changed conditions. Let assurance be given that we shall face facts, and not run away from them.

Let assurance be given, too, that we have no sympathy with political leaders who approach public questions from any standpoint save that of public interest. Let assurance be given that we resent selfishness, betrayal, and perfidy, whether within our party or without, and that we will repudiate false leadership wherever it shows itself. It is not enough to defeat Roosevelt; it is not enough to elect a Republican President. Unless we stand for something more than opportunism our hour of victory will be brief and we shall in 1936 only lay the foundation for a final disaster in 1940.

At the outset I presented the thought that in our attack upon the depression we should place the emphasis on reducing fixed charges rather than on uneconomic and fruitless efforts to raise the general price level, and that we should, as one step in that direction, bring interest rates into line with incomes and prices by sound expedients that have been used successfully elsewhere. Such a proposal would arouse enthusiasm in the debt-ridden West, which, since the days of the Farmers' Alliance and "16 to 1", has always been willing to follow leaders who promised to lighten the burden of mortgages. Such a proposal should also win the support of the eastern investor, who must by now realize that the effort to collect 6-percent interest on 3-percent investments is abortive and is drawing the country toward an economic collapse in which principal as well as interest will be lost.

We should pledge a further reduction of fixed charges by curtailing Government expenditures, balancing the Budget, liquidating the public debt, and making the holders of Federal, State, and municipal bonds share the tax burden with the owners of homes, farms, stores, and factories.

We should demobilize the huge army of tax-eating bureaucrats that has been assembled in Washington and elsewhere, and thereby end the exploitation of the people by the most overprivileged class in the country—a class that neither spins nor weaves, but lives in an affluence that is the envy of every other group in the land.

We should insure to American agriculture and industry their home market by confining imports, as nearly as possible, to noncompetitive products. The Republican Party believes in developing foreign commerce, but not at the expense of American farmers, manufacturers, and workingmen. The Republican Party believes in bringing domestic supply and demand into balance, and will sanction any wise policy to accomplish that end; but it holds that the first step toward that objective should be to reserve the American market for the American producer. The Republican Party believes in a protective tariff, in decent wages, and in fair prices for American products. The Republican Party believes in America first.

The Republican Party believes that it is the business of the Government to govern, and of the people to run the Nation's business. It does not believe that the State should go into competition with its own citizens. Government ownership and operation of some businesses eventually leads to government ownership and operation of all businesses, for individual enterprise cannot compete successfully with enterprises that pay no taxes and make no pretense of using a double-entry system of bookkeeping. The Republican Party opposes socialism in all its forms and disguises, not only because socialism never has worked and never will work, but because it cannot even be given a fair trial without first scrapping democracy.

We should decentralize government and return to the States the powers reserved to them in the Constitution. This country is too big to be governed, in every detail, by a group of tax-eating, buck-passing, world-saving, swivel-chair theorizers in Washington. We should unscramble the alphabet, dismantle the heterogeneous assortment of emergency machinery as soon as possible, and return the functions of government to the regular Government departments.

We should cancel such executive orders as carry the sanction of criminal penalties, and we should require the rest to be published before they become effective.

Pending recovery we should make decent provision for relief of the unemployed, without waste or favoritism. We should take relief out of politics, so that a man might vote any ticket he pleased and still continue to eat.

The Republican Party came into existence as a party of emancipation. It must continue as a party of emancipation. Its most immediate duty is to strike from the wrists of the people the shackles of regimentation. The Republican Party must be a liberal party—not liberal in the sense in which the word is used by those whose liberalism consists in being liberal with other peoples money, but liberal in the sense implied by Cavour when he declared that "a liberal is a man who loves liberty."

It was Lincoln who said, "In great emergencies moderation is generally safer than radicalism." We who are his followers are still imbued with his sense of restraint. We prefer to exemplify that "mingling of progressive hope and historic caution", which alone can insure safe progress. We are not oblivious to the need of reforms, or to the desirability of improving the social structure, but we believe that what America needs most just now is a pulmotor, not a face-lifting operation.

This statement of objectives, which I have presented as a modest contribution from a worker in the ranks, is neither radical nor reactionary. It recognizes the profit motive as the essential drive spring of the economic machine, but lays down a formula for a fairer division of the wealth created by industry, between those who work, manage, and take risks, and those who merely hold a mortgage on the plant. It rejects the economics of scarcity and substitutes the economics of abundance and a better-balanced buying power. It accepts the idea of a dynamic as against a static America, but insists that, whatever changes be made, this shall shall continue to be in every sense America.

CONFIDENCE IS THE KEYSTONE OF THE ARCH OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. JESSE P. WOLCOTT, of Michigan, before the Women's Republican Club of Massachusetts at Boston April 9, 1935:

Great far-reaching issues are in the making at Washington. Never before in the history of our country has the attention of our people been so focused on national affairs. This is as it should be. It was contemplated by our forebears that although the actual administration of the Government should be left to representatives, the people should nevertheless guide the policies of administration after there had been ample opportunity for discussion. I assume that it was partly for the purpose of giving consideration to national affairs that the Women's Republican Club of Massachusetts was organized, and I am particularly pleased and honored to have this opportunity to meet with you and contribute my mite to the service you are performing.

As Republicans, we have been charged with obstructionist tactics every time one of us has raised his voice against the new deal. Whenever we have called attention to the potential destruction of American ideals by certain phases of the President's program, we have been challenged with the now hackneyed response, "What have you to offer instead?"

We do not need to concern ourselves so much at the present time with the formulation of a platform for the next election. Every day the Democratic administration at Washington is creating new issues. Already they have become crystallized to the extent that we know the Republican Party is going to be called upon at the next election to recapture, first of all, the fundamental constitutional rights which have been denied our people by this administration.

Because of the constant changing of the panorama of politics, both domestic and foreign, it is too early for our party to formulate anything but a tentative program of policies, but suffice it to say that the Republican Party is and will be, as it always has been, the party of the people—the party which has always manifested its influence and to a large extent has been successful in maintaining America for Americans, the home market for domestic production, a living wage for our workers, and always will have firm belief in the right of every individual to exercise rugged individualism, commensurate with the public weal, which has characterized our citizenry from the birth of the Nation.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty"—personal and collective liberty—and without rugged individualism and eternal vigilance we will lapse into a regimented state of socialism. We can therefore assure the people, even at this early date, that the platform of the party next year will include at least the principle of self-government. It will assert in substance that the Government was created primarily for all the people, the doctrine advanced by the illustrious Lincoln in building the foundation for the party, as distinguished from the policy of the present administration, that the people exist for the Government and that private rights should be subordinated to the oligarchy of brain-trusters now functioning at Washington. This oligarchy has displaced, for all intents and purposes, the democracy of Jefferson, who so firmly believed that all men were endowed with the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness without governmental restriction, and by only such supervision on the part of the Government as to assure each and every one freedom in effectuating these guaranties.

First, then, it is the duty of the Republican Party to prevent the destruction by this administration of those ideals of American government for which our forefathers fought, and we must continue to fight for their preservation with the same courage and understanding which characterized their sacrifice.

If we sailed out of Boston Harbor with Liverpool as the port of destination, and the next day found ourselves headed straight for the rocks of the coast of Maine, our immediate concern would not be the port of Liverpool. We would be more interested in whether the engineer was going to reverse the engines in time to avoid catastrophe. If we were plunging down a steep grade in an automobile devoid of a foot brake, with the probability of turning upside down in a washout at the bottom of the hill, we would be thankful for the suggestion that we might try the emergency brake. If we, without any knowledge of the bailing out of an airplane, suddenly found ourselves in midair, plunging toward the earth and destruction, we would thank some person for the suggestion that we pull the ripcord which would open the parachute. In like manner, it is the immediate duty of the Republican Party to apply the brakes on this administration, the policies of which constitute the vehicle in which the American people are riding to social and economic destruction.

It seems to me the Republican Party has conducted itself in an admirable manner during this administration. Although we have not wavered in our desire to safeguard those fundamental constitutional doctrines of liberty, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and the right of every individual citizen to exercise the prerogatives of citizenship without too much governmental interference, nevertheless, we have gone along with the administration in every sound, worthwhile piece of legislation which we thought essential for the relief of those who found themselves in physical and social distress as a result of a world war and a resultant international chaos for which the Republican Party surely cannot be blamed. Every bill introduced in Congress which has had as its purpose the relief of unemployment, the assurance of a decent livelihood for the aged and infirm, the improvement of working conditions, and the creation of remunerative markets for the products of our farms and factories, have had the wholehearted support of the Republican Party. With equal sincerity and tenacious holding to principle, we have combated the attempts of the President and his administration to effectuate certain policies which will result (and have already resulted in no small degree) in the creation of a socialized state, with an accompanying regimentation of endeavor under governmental dictatorship.

Because of this spirit of cooperation on the part of the Republicans even at the expense of criticism within our own party, the Democrats have no one to blame but themselves for the failure of any part of their program. If the farmers of the cotton South, and the wheat, corn, and pork farmers of the far West find it necessary to denounce the President and his erudite satellites and decry his policies because he has destroyed the markets for their products, the criticism cannot be charged to obstructionist tactics on the part of the Republican Party. Their protestations are but voicings of the inevitable results of unsound doctrines. They are but the cold realities following the adoption of untried, unsound, and to a large extent unwarranted theories. If the people of the Midwest challenge the motives which are bringing about destruction of their agricultural and industrial markets; if the sugar-beet farmers of Michigan complain that the domestic sugar industry is being destroyed, it simply means that they are but voicing their appreciation of the Republican administrations of the past which have safeguarded them in their right to expand their crops in proportion to the expansion of the market for those crops.

If the people of Maine denounce the fact that Cuban potatoes are being sold in the markets of Boston and Portland, they are but giving expression to their dissatisfaction with the foreign policy of the administration, which in its adoption has given encouragement to the importation of Cuban potatoes, to the prejudice of the Maine crop.

If the people of the New England States, using the word of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, "whine" (which means to find fault in a weak, childish way) because their textile plants have had to close, adding their thousands of employees to the ranks of the unemployed, it is but an attempt on the part of a tolerant and long-suffering people to make the administration at Washington see the error of an economy which contemplates the purchase of foreign products with American capital, in order that the foreign countries might buy American goods. What an insult to the people of New England, the spring from which has flowed forth since the Revolution a stream of patriotism, courage, fortitude, love of country, and the ability and the will to sacrifice for that country. The people of the Colonies, of which Massachusetts was one, humbly begged and pleaded with a tyrannical king to assure them of certain God-given rights, but when their pleadings and supplications fell on deaf ears, they took up their hoes and rakes, forged their plowshares into sabers, and, with the other poor weapons at their command, wrested their independence from that tyranny.

The people of New England are no different today than they were then. You have, with all of the humbleness and courtesy at your command, beseeched the President of the United States to help you reopen your closed factories. You are confronted with a condition which makes it impossible for you to get relief in this respect. The textile factories of Massachusetts will not open as a result of a lowering of the processing tax on cotton, or by any action of the President in curtailing the importation of cheaply manufactured Japanese textiles. This is directly contrary to the "good neighbor" policy of the administration. It would not be considered courteous on the part of the administration to put an embargo or raise the tariff against the importation of goods, manufactured with peon labor in Japan or any other country of the world. What matters it that the textile workers of Massachusetts join the breadlines? Henry Wallace is not yet willing to admit the failure of his pet theory, that the fewer crops they raise the richer our farmers will become. He is going to prove that his theories are correct, even though in doing so he has to close every textile mill in the New England States and plow under every row of cotton in the South.

President Roosevelt assured us when he embarked upon this sea of experimentation that if any part of the program was found to be unsound he would be the first to recognize it. The people of the United States are in universal accord that the agricultural and tariff policies of this administration have been proven to be unsound. The only effect of the Cotton Control Act has been to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. This is evidenced by the fact that while the large cotton growers of the South have had their incomes increased, thousands of the tenant farmers and share-croppers have been forced off the land through the operation of the act. The administration, to offset this, has had to recommend legislation involving the expenditure of $50,000,000 for the purpose of rehabilitating the poor cotton growers of the South who are in despair because of the Cotton Control Act. Ruinous foreign competition is the inevitable result of the tariff policy of this administration, and while the President insists upon opening the door to the importation of Japanese textiles, the industry in the New England States is dying a slow death. Mills have closed not only in Massachusetts but also in the Southern States, and for the first time in the history of the cotton and textile industries the people of the North and the people of the South are in perfect harmony in recognizing that the interests of one are the interests of the other. And so, with the realization that the ship of state cannot sail the sea of progress without both the rudder of the North and the propeller of the South, we are at last joining hands against the common enemy. The termites eating into the foundation of democracy must be destroyed.

It is particularly fitting that I should call attention to this joinder of purpose in the shadow of the Bunker Hill Monument, at which Daniel Webster said:

"Let us cultivate a true spirit of union and harmony. In pursuing the great objects our condition points out to us, let us act under a settled conviction and an habitual feeling that these 24 States are one country. Let our conceptions be enlarged to the circle of our duties. Let us extend our ideas over the whole of the vast field in which we are called to act. Let our object be our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country."

And especially here in Boston, where Robert C. Winthrop, in 1879, in a letter to the Boston Commercial Club said:

"There are no points of the compass on the chart of true patriotism."

Earlier, at Faneuil Hall, he had said:

"I have heard something said about allegiance to the South. I know of no South, no North, no East, no West, to which I owe my allegiance."

Here in Massachusetts, at the cornerstone of the Nation, is a proper place to call attention to the insidious and pernicious sectional influences upon which are predicated many of the policies of the present administration. There should be no South, no North, no East, and no West. There likewise should not be any advantage given to one section over another.

The Democratic Party has not been in the saddle many years since the birth of the Republican Party under the oaks at Jackson, in my home State. The old democracy believed, as we Republicans believe, that the geographical boundaries of our States were not created for the purpose of setting off one particular section of the country to vie with another. New-deal democracy is different. It was expressed in the cloak rooms of the House of Representatives at Washington by one perhaps over-zealous member of the majority party, that he was going to see to it that his State "got theirs while the getting was good."

Because of the inane schoolboy approach to the problems of southern agriculture, those very fine people have lost their foreign market for cotton. Because the President wants the United States to be a "good neighbor" to Japan, is not in itself sufficient reason for the destruction of the rich textile industry of Massachusetts.

Now, in summarizing this whole issue, let me say to the people of Massachusetts that if they believe in the removal of their factories, with an attending dissipation of home, farm, and all other property values, this can be more readily accomplished by continuing to vote for the new deal than in any other manner that I know of. But this is inconceivable. The people of Massachusetts still believe that the cotton and other agricultural interests of the South should be protected and their markets expanded. They believe that the people of the Midwest and the far West should be protected in their rights to raise crops and manufacture automobiles, without limitation by the Federal Government, and they, of course, believe that it is only by destruction of sectional thought and influence that the right of the worker in Massachusetts to be insured against the loss of employment by the importation of cheaply manufactured textiles will be safeguarded. Under Republican administration the South was left to its cotton, the West was left to its wheat and corn, the New England States were left to their industries and their agriculture; and so it will be again when the Republican Party is returned to administer to the needs of the people. Then, and then only, will we have that "abundant life" promised us by this administration.

You will notice that throughout my remarks I have drawn a distinction between the Democrats as we knew them a few years ago, and the new-deal Democrats. I have done this deliberately, having in mind that the majority of Democrats who have earnestly and faithfully followed the doctrines of Thomas Jefferson and the new-deal Democrats are as far apart in their advocacies as Republicans are from Communists. Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia, is one of the old-line Democrats whom we all respect, and whose judgment is as sound as the Rock of Gibraltar. At the banquet of the National Association of Newspaper Editors in Washington last Saturday evening Senator GLASS hit the nail on the head when he said:

In what category then can we place those who call themselves Democrats but who believe in the new deal? They are those who have been drugged by the prescriptions of the quack doctors of the administration. It is not to be wondered at that so many of our people who were in the depths of despond—a condition which resulted from a costly war which threw the whole world into chaos, from which we are but now emerging—should have swallowed these sugar-coated palliatives with some degree of hope and confidence in the results. They have had a rude awakening from a delusive sleep, with a terribly bad headache. With the dawning of the inevitable "morning after" they want no more stimulants of that nature, and are returning to the old family doctor for succor.

Well, the old family doctor is expecting them. He knew from the history of the case that the new medicine would not give them permanent relief. He is going to diagnose their case all over again in the light of new developments and will prescribe for them. Whether the headache takes the form of a delusion, whether it takes the form of communism, fascism, nazi-ism, or just a plain abandonment of common sense, the prescription will be the same. The old doctor will not aggravate the ailment by trying to cure communism with communism, fascism with fascism, nazi-ism with nazi-ism, socialism with socialism, fear with lack of confidence, but will give them a great big dose of the medicine which has always cured them of all of their economic and social ailments—a great big dose of constitutionalism and Americanism as promulgated by the ideals and principles of the Republican Party. You can't compel the American people to adopt fascism with the threat of communism; you can't compel the American people to adopt nazi-ism with the threat of fascism; you can't compel us to accept socialism by the claim that the American Constitution has outlived its usefulness.

There seems to be a veritable epidemic of justified dissatisfaction. Whether this dissatisfaction is evidenced by the dumbness of the people to appreciate the finer things in life, as reflected by F. E. R. A. research into the movements of populations of Europe and Asia in the second millennium; or the militant anarchistic labeled endeavors of the farmers to get a decent price for their milk; or the "whining" of the people of New England because they are losing their factories; it is apparent, nevertheless, that the dissatisfaction is existent and growing.

It is evidenced by the protestations of those who have to pay an exorbitant price for meat due to the un-Christian and economically unsound policy of slaughtering and burying millions of pigs; in the lamentations of the Southern cotton grower that his foreign markets are being destroyed; in the assemblies of farmers throughout the Midwest, who in their meetings reflect and denounce the fact that the importation of agricultural commodities is steadily increasing because of the tariff policy of the administration; in the money market of the United States, due to the proposal to take from the people the last vestige of an opportunity for the obtaining of private loans and credit, by concentrating the credit and monetary powers under one political head in Washington; in the retaliation by our State governments against the attempts of the Federal Government to take over purely State functions; in the strikes in our factories which are but evidence of the fact that wages have not been increased in line with the forced increase in the price of commodities. In the face of these failures, how can it be said that the new deal has been successful? Because of the inconsistencies in policies and administration, how can it be hoped that it will be any more sucessful in the future than it has been in the past? Confidence is the keystone of the arch of government. Without confidence and at least a show of integrity no government can endure. It would not be quite as bad if this lack of confidence was confined to the administration, but we know that many of our people do not distinguish between the administration and the Government, and so there is a constant and growing fear that because of the inconsistencies of the administration there will be a resultant lack of confidence in government, which it will take the Republican Party years to overcome after it comes back into power.

May we be reminded of some of these inconsistencies? The President in his inaugural address, in criticizing some persons unknown to me, whom he calls "the rulers of the exchange of mankind's goods", says:

"True, they have tried, but their efforts have been cast in the pattern of an outworn tradition. Faced by failure of credit, they have proposed only the lending of more money."

Has President Roosevelt in any manner or for any purpose stopped the lending of money? Furthermore, he says:

"They have no vision, and when there is no vision the people perish."

Vision is described as an apparition, a dream, a fantasy, an unreal or imaginary thing. If, by having visions, the people can pull themselves out of the depression, then we should have had prosperity months ago, because there has been no wanting of apparitions during the last 2 years.

Do you people in Massachusetts know why the administration thinks it advisable not to give you the protection to your industries which you think you need? I didn't know until by glancing through the inaugural address the other day, I found an answer. I don't know whether it is the President's or not, but it is the only reason that I can see for closing the textile factories of Massachusetts. Is this the reason? And again I quote from his inaugural address:

"Hand in hand with this, we must frankly recognize the overbalance of population in our industrial centers, and by engaging on a national scale in a redistribution, endeavor to provide a better use of the land for those best fitted for the land."

This is apparently the answer. You have too many people in Massachusetts. You must seek the "more abundant life" elsewhere, and so he wants you to move out on the farms. We will welcome the good textile workers of Massachusetts out in Michigan, but we would rather they would come of their own free will and accord and not from necessity occasioned by false economic theories. And in this particular, while we are talking of inconsistencies which result in lack of confidence, let me say that the Banking Act of 1935, wherein it regiments credit under one political head, with the dictatorial power in that head to compel the banks to buy Government bonds when there is an approaching danger to the Government bonding market, perhaps at the same time there is a desire on the part of the banks to loan money to industry, results in a concentration of industry around the 12 credit structures set up by the act. Population follows industry, and the Banking Act of 1935 will do more to effectuate the centralization of population than any other thing that I know of. What manner of man is this, who on the one hand advocates the decentralization of population and on the other hand forces down the throat of the American Congress a bill which is particularly designed to centralize population, contrary to the announced administration policies? Is this gross inconsistency conducive to confidence?

We are much concerned with the effect which the Banking Act of 1935 will have upon the soundness of our currency. Government financing should be upon the same basis as private financing, and the cost of running the Government should be financed by voluntary investment in Government obligations. The Banking Act of 1935 creates a situation where the Government may compel the use of the savings of the people to market Government obligations. This method of financing becomes a forced loan and is one of the most vicious inroads on liberty.

When the banks are forced to invest in Government bonds against their will, and at the same time the same authority which may compel them to take these bonds is the authority to which Congress has delegated its prerogatives of coining money and regulating the value thereof, there is such a close affiliation between the public debt and the currency-creating power as to leave but little room for doubt that the one might seriously affect the other, thereby causing a fluctuation in the value of our currency as the public debt increases or decreases. Federal Reserve banks should be maintained as central banks whose purpose is to maintain a sound currency and to provide credit to American business when and as such credit is needed. Federal Reserve Banks were never intended to become fiscal agencies of the Federal Government as contemplated by the Banking Act of 1935, primarily for the purpose of liquidating the annual deficits and the national debt.

But let us get back to the inaugural address. The President says further:

"Through this program of action we address ourselves to putting our own national house in order and making income balance outgo."

If that means anything, it means that he is either going to keep his expenditures within the present income or raise the income to balance the expenditures. I challenge him to propose legislation in the Congress which would increase taxes sufficient to balance expenditures. But it is due partly to the fear that he will adopt one of the only two ways of paying the debt of this administration, namely, by confiscatory taxation that business is so hesitant about expanding and giving employment. The other way to pay the debt is by inflation, of which the less said the better. Of course, we might balance income with outgo by reducing outgo, but this method seems to be giving him little worry at present. In the words of Mr. Roosevelt:

"Only a foolish optimist can deny the dark realities of the moment."

And in this connection, I quote again from his inaugural address, in which he says that the task can be helped, * * *.

"* * * By insistence that the Federal, State, and local governments act forthwith on the demand that their cost be drastically reduced."

And again:

"In the field of world policy I would dedicate this Nation to the policy of the good neighbor—the neighbor who respects his obligations and respects the sanctity of his agreements in and with a world of neighbors * * *."

And again:

"Small wonder that confidence languishes, for it thrives only on honesty, on honor, on the sacredness of obligations, on faithful protection, on unselfish performance; without them it cannot live."

And again:

"If we are to go forward we must move as a trained and loyal army, willing to sacrifice for the good of a common discipline, because without such discipline no progress is made, no leadership becomes effective. We are, I know, ready and willing to submit our lives and property to such discipline because it makes possible a leadership which aims at a larger good."

And so you "whiners" in New England know now why you are asked to forego any recourse to executive action in the closing of your factories, you are but making the willing sacrifice for the good of a common discipline, without which no progress is made and without which no leadership becomes effective.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR GENERAL DEBATE ON THE BANKING ACT, 1935

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate on the bill H. R. 7617 be extended to continue throughout the day on Saturday, with the understanding that the House will take up no other business than that, the time to be equally divided under the provisions of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill H. R. 7617 be continued through Saturday, to be equally divided and controlled between himself and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER]; that said debate conclude when the House adjourns on Saturday May 4. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, will the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency give some assurance that some of the Members who are asking for time are going to be allotted time? There is great complaint that they are not able to get time. When 15 hours was allowed to the Committee, it was not allowed just for the members of the committee. That was not the understanding. There were such Members as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK], and other gentlemen who say they cannot get time. We have had that difficulty every once in a while, where Members of the House, on an important subject, do not get an opportunity to speak. Now, this is a subject for which 15 hours was given, solely for the reason that so many Members of the House, not simply members of the committee, desired to speak. I wish the gentleman would give some assurance that every Member who desires to speak, within reason, will get some time.

Mr. STEAGALL. I should hesitate to say that I could guarantee that every Member who desired to speak could get time. I may say, however, that the purpose of the request is to accommodate gentlemen who have expressed a desire to use time in the debate. Because of intimations made by the Speaker I have anticipated that there would be an additional day and I have granted a longer time to Members who have spoken for this reason, anticipating that I would be able reasonably to take care of the time generally in the House, and that is the purpose of the request.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, many Members have asked me whether or not there was going to be a session on Saturday and I have assured them that if there was a session on Saturday nothing else would be done except to continue general debate on this bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. That provision was included in my request, I may say to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. I have no objection to a session on Saturday if we could have the understanding that no business would be conducted on that day except a continuance of general debate on this bill. I do not know whether the Speaker is willing to reply to my suggestion whether it could be generally understood that the Chair would not recognize anyone for any request except purely perfunctory ones.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am in hopes the Speaker will announce that limitation so Members will know what may be expected.

Mr. SNELL. I realize, of course, that it is really unfair to ask the Speaker such a question, but under the circumstances I thought perhaps the Chair might not be averse to expressing the intention of the Chair in this regard.

The SPEAKER. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, the Chair will state that it is important that general debate on this bill should be concluded this week. Many Members have expressed a desire to be heard on this bill in general debate, and the Chair hopes that the House will agree to meet on Saturday.

The Chair will make this statement so there will be no misapprehension as to the views of the Chair: That the Chair will not recognize anyone to call up any bill or to transact any business whatsoever except to submit perfunctory requests, such, for instance, as to correct the RECORD or to extend remarks.

Mr. SNELL. Those are purely perfunctory matters.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I do not think I yet have received any assurance that these Members are going to be taken care of. Sometimes we have difficulty in getting assurances or even answers to inquiries.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I thought I had made quite clear that the chief purpose of this request for extension of the time for general debate is for the purpose of yielding to Members of the House who are not members of the committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman whose names I have mentioned be given time?

Mr. STEAGALL. I would remind the gentleman that we have yielded time this afternoon to several Members of the House not members of the committee, and we expect that the greater portion of the time from now on will be consumed by Members of the House who are not members of the committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Let me ask the gentleman definitely whether the Members whose names I have mentioned will be yielded time?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not know that I understand the purport of the gentleman's inquiry. Who particularly desired the time?

Mr. O'CONNOR. They have been asking the gentleman for time but cannot get any more assurance out of the gentleman than I can get out of him at this moment.

Mr. STEAGALL. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK], among others.

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman from New York that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] made a request of me for time, but later yesterday afternoon he withdrew his request. I told him there was no need for him to withdraw it, for him to let it stand; but he withdrew his request.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If I may make the suggestion to the gentleman from Alabama, I think those Members who want to talk not in excess of 15 minutes should have preference over Members who want to talk for an hour; and I think that if Saturday is devoted to general debate every Member desiring to talk could be accommodated. I sincerely hope they are.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILL REFERRED

H. R. 6084. An act to authorize the city of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not to exceed $1,000,000 for the purpose of acquiring the electric light and power, water, and telephone properties of the Citizens' Light, Power & Water Co., and to finance and operate the same, and validating the preliminary proceedings with respect thereto, and for other purposes;

H. R. 6223. An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 7132. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce to exchange a portion of the naval station and a portion of the lighthouse reservation at Key West, Fla.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Chapter 69—Assembly Joint Resolution 51—Relative to memorializing the President and the Congress to enact legislation (H. R. 2772) declaring admission day a holiday for all officers and employees of the United States whose headquarters are in California

Whereas the 9th day of September is the day when all persons residing in California celebrate the admission of the Golden State into the Union; and

Whereas this day of celebration is one of great sentiment to the people of the State of California; and

Whereas the 9th day of September of each year is an official holiday for all public employees of the State of California and political subdivisions thereof; and

Whereas many organizations, together with the Native Sons of the Golden West, have sponsored the plan to allow officers and employees of the United States whose headquarters are in California to celebrate and honor the admission day of California; and

Whereas on January 3, 1935, there was introduced by Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT, of California, a bill known as "H. R. 2772", which proposes to declare the 9th day of September of each year, which is the date California was admitted to the Union, a legal holiday for all officers and employees of the United States whose headquarters are in the State of California: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, respectfully urge the President and the Congress of the United States to enact H. R. 2772, which proposes to provide a legal holiday for Federal employees; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and the Vice President of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that such Senators and Members from California are hereby respectfully urged to support such legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on Finance:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Boston.

Resolutions relative to protection of American industry and employees from foreign competition

Whereas it is apparent that competition with foreign countries can no longer be met, in many instances, by greater manufacturing efficiency or by further increases in tariffs; and

Whereas, owing to low wage scales in foreign countries, the instability of foreign exchanges and the disparity between the dollar and foreign currencies it is too frequently possible for foreign producers to send quantities of their goods into the American domestic market sufficient to break that market and prevent the sale therein of American-made products; and

Whereas such disruption of the American market seriously interferes with the employment and earnings of American workers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to utilize fully the powers vested in him by section 3 (e) of the National Industrial Recovery Act to apply embargoes or establish quotas as a means of protecting American manufacturers, and thus American workers, against the losses they now suffer from foreign competition; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth forthwith forward copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the Presiding Officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

In house of representatives, adopted, April 23, 1935.

In senate, adopted, in concurrence April 26, 1935.

F. W. COOK,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New York, praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualifications of the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. LONG and Mr. OVERTON], which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from Hon. Lino Padron Rivera, chairman of the special committee of the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico to investigate public works constructed by the P. R. E. R. A., relative to the manner in which the chief of the Emergency Relief Administration for Puerto Rico, Mr. James R. Bourne, is proceeding, and referring especially to one José Soto Rivera, chief of a division of the Puerto Rican Emergency Relief Administration, and also enclosing copy of opinion and decision rendered by the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico on January 14, 1932, on disbarment proceedings instituted against said José Soto Rivera, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate memorials of sundry citizens of Bradford, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called "Wheeler-Rayburn public-utility regulation bill", which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from R. Lee Davis, supreme commander Veterans' Club of America, Orange, Tex., on behalf of that club, praying for the enactment of the so-called "Patman bonus bill", which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LONERGAN (for Mr. MALONEY) presented a petition of sundry citizens of New Britain and vicinity, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation establishing a central bank, as advocated by Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also (for Mr. MALONEY) presented the petition of members of the Bridgeport (Conn.) Commercial Council (being telephone employees), praying that the words "or contribute financial or other support to it" be stricken out of section 8, page 10, paragraph (2), of Senate bill 1958, known as the "Wagner labor-disputes bill", which was ordered to lie on the table.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. VANDENBERG presented resolutions adopted by the Old Age Pension Division, Modern Fraternal Union, Inc., Peoria, Ill., which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEORIA, ILL., April 20, 1935.

To the Honorable Senate of the United States of America:

Whereas the social security bill, as passed by the House of Representatives, in Washington, D. C., on April 19, 1935, is described by Congressmen as a pauper dole; and

Whereas President Franklin D. Roosevelt's message to the House of Representatives on June 8, 1934, contained the promise of security against the hazards and vicissitudes of life; and

Whereas Congressman Gearhart says the amount appropriated for this year for paying old-age pensions is but $49,750,000 and that this amount will only give each pensioner $6.56 a year, or 54 cents a month, to the 7,500,000 who are over 65 years of age: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Old Age Pension Division, Modern Fraternal Union, Inc., That we are very much dissatisfied and disappointed with the social security bill, as passed by the National House of Representatives, and herewith petition the United States Senate to amend the social security bill so that the promise of President Roosevelt may be realized, and the millions of old people, who are now in need may be taken care of; and be it further

Resolved, That the social security bill be so amended that the old-age pension shall take precedence over the other portions of the bill, and the minimum amount of the pension be $30 a month for each of the old-age pensioners; and be it further

Resolved, That we ask your honorable body to make the social security bill a Federal bill, not dependent upon any State pension law, since it has been found that very few States are paying the old-age pensions, as required by law, on account of the depression, which is causing old people to suffer for want of the bare necessities of life; and be it further

Resolved, That we beg of the United States Senate not to allow this social security bill to become a partisan measure, but a relief measure for all old people over 65 years of age.

Signed by members of the executive committee of the supreme council, Old Age Pension Division, M. F. U., Inc.

PROCESSING TAX ON COTTON

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD the body of a petition signed by 7,414 people asking that the processing tax be removed from cotton and that something be done for the employees of our closed cotton mills. It was transmitted to me by the Chamber of Commerce of Providence, R. I. I have received petitions signed by over 10,200 people of my State on the same subject. I have also received a resolution adopted by the Common Council of the City of Pawtucket, R. I. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read them, but I ask to have the body of the matter printed in the RECORD and the petitions appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the body of the petition and the resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

[Chamber of Commerce of Providence, R. I.]

PETITION

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the State of Rhode Island, do hereby petition you to take immediate steps to save from destruction the cotton-textile industry, upon which thousands of residents of Rhode Island and nearby States are dependent for their livelihood.

The serious plight of this industry cannot be overemphasized. Many mills in this State and in other New England States have been closed, never to open again, and others are on the verge of closing. As a result, thousands of people have been thrown out of employment, and the very existence of whole communities is seriously threatened.

We therefore most earnestly entreat you (1) to repeal the processing tax on cotton and (2) to enact legislation which will give adequate protection to the cotton-textile industry in this country against importations of goods manufactured by cheap labor abroad.

APRIL 10, 1935.

Resolution

Whereas it is generally recognized among both employees and employers in the textile industry of this city and State and other citizens who have been adversely affected thereby that the Federal processing taxes have greatly injured the continued operation of our textile businesses and have reduced employment of the people of the city of Pawtucket; and

Whereas the continued imposition of this form of taxation will further damage local industries of this city and cause even greater unemployment of many of the citizens of Pawtucket; and

Whereas in view of the opposition of large numbers of the people of this city and State and public officials of this and other States it appears necessary officially to offer the objections of the Common Council of the City of Pawtucket toward this unfair form of taxation, this expression being now particularly timely because of the present attitude of Federal officials toward the needs of this and other New England communities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this the Common Council of the City of Pawtucket, R. I., strongly protests the continued imposition of this tax and requests that the Secretary of Agriculture and the President of the United States take steps to relieve the hardships created because of this tax; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the clerk of the common council to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of Agriculture, and to the United States Senators from Rhode Island.

A true copy.

City Clerk.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT

Mr. WAGNER. I ask to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table certain telegrams which I have received, one from the Ludlum Steel Co., one of the small units of the steel industry, another from the Apparel Industries Committee, another from the Clothing Manufacturers' Association of the United States, another from the Clothing Manufacturers' Exchange, one from the Allied Hat Manufacturers of New York, and other telegrams, all urging the passage of legislation which will extend the N. R. A. for a period of 2 years.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WATERVLIET, N. Y., May 1, 1935.

Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER:

Ludlum Steel Co., one of the small units of the steel industry, desires your support in securing extension of National Industrial Recovery Act for period of 2 years. We believe N. R. A. has helped stabilize business conditions over last 2 years and has been a protection to the smaller units rather than otherwise, but that most of good accomplished would be sacrificed if N. R. A. is not extended for reasonable period.

LUDLUM STEEL CO.,
H. G. BATCHELLER, President.

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 2, 1935.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Personal, Washington, D. C.:

Apparel industries, comprising approximately 20,000 units, wants and desperately needs N. R. A. We urge you to give us immediate extension of N. R. A. in unemasculated form for 2 years. We need long breathing space to function under codes without fear of repetition of present devastating period of indecision. Any makeshift would increase, accentuate, and perpetuate the uncertainty which is our great handicap to recovery.

APPAREL INDUSTRIES COMMITTEE FOR THE RENEWAL OF N. R. A.

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 2, 1935.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Chamber:

We have today wired membership Senate Finance Committee "The Clothing Manufacturers' Association of the United States, America, a country-wide organization representing 80 percent of the clothing industry in the United States, wishes to register vehement protest against the proposed short-term extension of the N. R. A. We urge your support of the improved Harrison bill providing for a 2-year extension. We believe that the country will be thrown back into a depression surpassing that from which the N. R. A. rescued industry if the act is not extended for a minimum of 2 years." We entreat your active support of the legislation.

CHARLES D. JAFFEE,
Vice President Clothing Manufacturers' Association of the United States of America, 225 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 2, 1935.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Chamber:

We have today wired membership Senate Finance Committee as follows: "The New York Clothing Manufacturers Exchange, with a membership of 220 men's clothing manufacturers and representing $300,000,000 annual output of men's clothing in the Greater New York area, appeals to you for favorable action on improved Harrison bill providing for 2-year extension of N. R. A. We believe that a short-term extension of N. R. A. will result in a return to the chaotic conditions rampant in industry before the enactment of the N. I. R. A., and implore your support of an extension of at least 2 years." We urge you use your efforts in favor of this legislation.

JULIUS H. LEVY, Executive Secretary,
New York Clothing Manufacturers Exchange, Inc.,
22 East Seventeenth Street, New York City.

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 2, 1935.

Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.:

This trade association, representing 82 manufacturers, wishes to go on record for the extension of the N. I. R. A. for a 2-year period. Much good has resulted through the N. R. A., and it will be to the interest of the industry to have it continue for 2 years. The proposed extension for 10 months would prolong the uncertainty of industry and chaos may result therefrom. We further protest against the Clark plan, and wish to emphasize the importance of code authorities being administered by industry members. Your support is earnestly solicited, for the association represents the type of manufacturers who have benefited by the N. I. R. A.

ALLIED HAT MANUFACTURERS, INC.,
LOUIS R. GOODMAN, President,

UTICA, N. Y., May 2, 1935.

Hon. R. F. WAGNER,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.:

Your favorable support for extension of N. R. A. and passage of following bills greatly urged by Local 753, United Textile Workers of America: Wagner No. 6288, Connery Nos. 6450 and 141, Byrnes No. 2039.

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 2, 1935.

Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

The independent retail pharmacists of New York City, which this organization officially represents, are greatly distressed over newspaper reports that President Roosevelt is apparently receding from his determination to extend N. R. A. for 2 years. We feel that action of Senate Finance Committee will only cause great business uncertainty. We urge you, on behalf of our industry locally, to appeal to President Roosevelt not to recede from his original position, which, in our opinion, is the only correct position.

President New York Pharmaceutical Council,

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. VAN NUYS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2642) to incorporate the American National Theater and Academy, reported it without amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (S. 2027) to regulate commerce in petroleum, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 576) thereon.

INVESTIGATION OF THE MUNITIONS INDUSTRY—REPORT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, on April 11 there came from the House of Representatives to the Senate the bill (H. R. 5529) to prevent profiteering in time of war and to equalize the burdens of war and thus provide for the national defense and promote peace. The bill was referred to the Special Committee on Investigation of the Munitions Industry, which committee now reports the bill with amendments and submits a report (No. 577) thereon.

There has been an understanding that when the committee reported the bill it would be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Therefore I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, does the bill contain references to our neutrality laws or suggest any policy in respect to them at all?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the bill deals with no neutrality feature whatsoever. It is confined strictly to the control of profits in time of war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On request of the Senator from North Dakota, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I desire to submit to the Senate the report of the committee in connection with this bill and to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the committee does not feel that the consideration of the bill and the report are by any means the most urgent obligation upon the committee named to investigate the munitions industry. Far more important do we consider the task of providing control of the munitions industry in both war and peace time. The committee is continuing its investigations in those fields and will be reporting to the Senate from time to time, and, in order that it may complete its work, it has authorized the chairman of the committee to report a resolution, which is reported at this time, to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The report (No. 577) on House bill 5529 which the committee is submitting I ask to have printed and to be placed on the desks of Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXPENSES OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATION OF THE MUNITIONS INDUSTRY

Mr. NYE, from the Special Committee on Investigation of the Munitions Industry, reported a resolution (S. Res. 129), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the Vice President under authority of Senate Resolution 206, agreed to April 12, 1934, to investigate the munitions industry, hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $45,000 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized to be expended for the purposes set forth in said resolution.

ADDITIONAL CLERK FOR INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate Resolution 117, submitted by Mr. WHEELER on April 11, 1935, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce is hereby authorized to employ for the remainder of the session of the Senate an assistant clerk, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $1,800 per annum.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS

Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate Resolution 121, submitted by Mr. MCKELLAR on April 25, 1935, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions and recesses of the Senate.

HEARINGS REFORE COMMITTEE TO AUDIT AND CONTROL THE CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE SENATE

Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported a resolution (S. Res. 128), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundreds words to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during any session or recess of the Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DUFFY:

A bill (S. 2745) to authorize the Secretary of War to appoint to the United States Military Academy one cadet from among the honor graduates of each of certain educational institutions; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BARKLEY:

A bill (S. 2746) for the relief of Warren G. Brickey; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MCKELLAR:

A bill (S. 2747) to authorize Canal Dredging Co. to bring suit in the Court of Claims against the United States for additional compensation under contract terminated as for the Government's best interests; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SCHALL:

A bill (S. 2748) for the relief of Arthur Edgar Scroggin; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CLARK:

A bill (S. 2749) granting a pension to Retta Tunnell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LONERGAN (for Mr. MALONEY):

A bill (S. 2750) for the relief of Horace Franklin McMahon; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. NEELY:

A bill (S. 2751) for the relief of Walter C. Price and Joseph C. Lesage; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2752) granting a pension to Jennie Tewksbury; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. VAN NUYS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 116) authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11, 1935, General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BOARD OF REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask consent to introduce two joint resolutions providing for appointments to the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, and I also ask unanimous consent for their present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolutions will be received. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolutions? The Chair hears none.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) to provide for the reappointment of Frederic A. Delano as a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, caused by the expiration of the term of Frederic A. Delano, of the city of Washington, on January 21, 1935, be filled by the reappointment of the recent incumbent (Frederic A. Delano) for the statutory term of 6 years.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 118) providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, caused by the expiration of the term of Irwin B. Laughlin, on January 21, 1935, be filled by the appointment of Roland S. Morris, a citizen of Pennsylvania, for the statutory term of 6 years.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM AT BELTSVILLE, MD.—E. W. SHEETS

Mr. CAREY. Out of order, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 126), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the cost of the construction, development, and expansion of the experimental farm of the Department of Agriculture at Beltsville, Md., and to investigate the circumstances connected with the demotion or dismissal of E. W. Sheets, formerly head of the Division of Animal Husbandry of the Bureau of Animal Industry in the Department of Agriculture, with a view to determining the connection, if any, between such demotion or dismissal and the construction, development, and expansion of said experimental farm. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the result of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $1,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. CAREY. I ask to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I inquire why the Senator seeks to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Is not the jurisdiction in the standing Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. CAREY. The funds used were out of the public-works funds which were appropriated by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand, but the substance of the resolution pertains to agriculture, and the standing Committee on Agriculture and Forestry would seem to have jurisdiction. I ask that the matter of reference be passed over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Subsequently the resolution was ordered to lie over under the rule.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PATENTS

Mr. McADOO submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 127), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

IMPORTATIONS OF COTTON CLOTH INTO THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, a great deal has been said recently with respect to the cotton situation. It is apparent we are losing our trade abroad, both for raw cotton and for cotton cloth.

For several years the Philippines have been our best customers of any political subdivision in the entire world for cotton cloth, bleached and unbleached. We are losing that trade to Japan.

The extent to which the consumption has gravitated away from the United States is clearly shown by a report of our trade commissioner located at Manila and made within recent months.

This report shows that imports or unbleached cotton cloth from Japan increased 858 percent in 1934 over 1933, while the imports from the United States declined 12 percent; that imports of bleached cotton cloth from Japan increased 308 percent, while the imports from the United States declined 25 percent; that the imports from Japan of dyed cotton cloth increased 133 percent, while the imports from the United States declined 51 percent; that the imports of printed cotton cloth from Japan increased 190 percent, while the imports from the United States declined 43 percent.

The report shows that for all these grades the imports from Japan increased 192 percent, while the imports from the United States decreased 43 percent.

I ask unanimous consent that a portion of the report showing the importations may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1934 IMPORTS OF COTTON-PIECE GOODS TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS FOR 9 MONTHS ENDING SEPTEMBER 30, 1934

While imports of all classes of cotton-piece goods from the United States have declined, imports from Japan have registered very substantial increases. Total imports of cotton-piece goods from Japan advanced from 13,826,353 square meters during the first 9 months of 1933 to 40,363,933 square meters for the similar period of 1934—an increase of 192 percent. For the same period imports of cotton-piece goods from the United States declined from 59,514,522 square meters to 33,892,152 square meters—a decline of 43 percent. With the exception of a small increase in dyed cotton-piece goods imports from Great Britain, imports of cotton-piece goods from all other countries declined during this 9-month period. During this 9-month period imports of cotton-piece goods from all countries were only about 625,000 square meters less than a year ago, which further reveals the heavy gains made by Japan in the trade formerly held by American cotton-piece goods importers. The following statement includes imports of cotton-piece goods into the Philippine Islands for the first 9 months of this year and for the similar period of 1933:

COMPARISON OF IMPORTS FROM SHIPS' MANIFESTS, 1933 AND 1934

An interesting trend in the imports of cotton piece goods, cotton yarns, underwears, hosieries, cotton ducks, and rayon goods from the United States and Japan is determined from the attached statement supplied by the author of the above memorandum. For the 12-month period ending November 1933 imports of these goods from the United States amounted to 68,870 packages as compared with 34,516 packages from Japan. In striking contrast to this, imports of these goods from the United States for the 12-month period ending November 1934 amounted to 36,194 packages and from Japan, 67,098 packages—a reversal of the trade insofar as the source of supply is concerned. Imports for this period of 1934 from Europe aggregating 7,638 packages showed a decline as compared with the similar period of 1933, when imports amounted to 8,814 packages Imports from China (Shanghai and Hong Kong) declined from 7,430 packages in 1933 to 6,883 packages for the same 12-month period of 1934.

OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, a few moments ago there was placed on the desk of each Senator a print of a portion of the report with reference to ocean mail contracts, submitted to the President by the Postmaster General, Mr. Farley.

It is not the entire report. It deals with the first 11 contracts only. I am calling the attention of Senators to the report in order that they may take advantage of the opportunity to give it such investigation as they may desire.

I wish to state in this connection that this report was made after an open public hearing by the Postmaster General. Information which was in the hands of the special Senate committee was turned over to the Post Office Department, and they then summoned witnesses, and permitted the contractors to be represented by counsel. The hearing was in progress for some months. Thereafter a general report was made by Mr. Farley on these contracts, and a special report was made on each individual contract.

The reports now being printed are the individual reports. The present print comprises the first 11 of them; and as the reports on the other contracts are printed, they also will be placed on the desk of each Senator for consideration and study.

EXTENSION OF THE N. R. A.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, under date of May 3, 1935, the executive council of the American Federation of Labor delivered a message to the President of the United States. I have been requested to have the message inserted in the RECORD, and I ask that it may be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., May 3, 1935.

MR. PRESIDENT: The executive council of the American Federation of Labor is deeply concerned over the action of the Senate Finance Committee in approving a resolution extending the National Recovery Act for a period of 10 months. We interpret such action as an abandonment of the administration's national-recovery program. In the opinion of the executive council, it represents a total disregard of the seriousness of the unemployment situation which prevails throughout the Nation, and a lack of appreciation of the value of the remedies which, under your Executive authority, have been applied to the economic ills of the Nation.

Through the application of the provisions of the National Recovery Act, which has been in effect since June 16, 1933, constructive plans have been followed and practical methods have been employed in all the heroic efforts which have been put forth to overcome unemployment. Even the most uncompromising foe of the National Recovery Act is forced to admit that through its operation child labor has been abolished, minimum rates of pay for unprotected workers have been lifted to a higher level, hours of labor have been reduced, many reprehensible unfair trade practices have been eliminated, and work opportunities created for millions of unemployed.

Your recommendation that a more effective and more constructive National Recovery Act be enacted by the Congress of the United States for a period of 2 years represents, in our opinion, the minimum legislative requirement which should become operative at this most important period in our national life. Nothing less will meet the urgent needs of the serious unemployment situation which prevails throughout the Nation. It is the emphatic opinion of the executive council that a continuation of the National Recovery Act for a period of 10 months as provided for in the joint resolution recommended by the Senate Finance Committee, will be regarded by labor throughout the Nation as a congressional abandonment of your national recovery policy and as the liquidation of the National Recovery Act. It represents, in our opinion, the end of the definite economic policy inaugurated under the new deal and a return to the old industrial, social, and economic policies administered by the reactionary forces of the Nation, and which human experience and history show were directly responsible for the distressing unemployment situation through which the Nation has passed during the last 5 years.

The joint resolution, if adopted by Congress, will take the heart out of the National Recovery Act. It is estimated that it will deprive 75 percent of working people of the benefits of section 7 (a), child-labor prohibition, minimum rates of pay, and maximum hours of employment as incorporated in industrial codes of fair competition. The National Recovery Act for the next 10 months would be a skeleton, a shadow, applicable to a small minority of workers employed in industries engaged in only what might be technically determined as interstate commerce.

The executive council would rather see the National Recovery Act abandoned, terminated, or repealed than emasculated and adopted for a 10-month period as recommended by the Senate Finance Committe.

The executive council feels justified in calling upon the friends of labor in Congress to vote against Senate Joint Resolution 113, proposed by the Senate Committee on Finance, and to decisively defeat it. We feel that the facts warrant an appeal to Congress to give the Nation nothing less than the 2-year extension of the National Recovery Act recommended by you in such a convincing way in your message to Congress on February 20, 1935.

In the opinion of the executive council the situation created through the action of the Senate Finance Committee is alarming. The working people of the Nation view with feelings of apprehension the amazing action of the Senate Finance Committee. Resentment, protest, social unrest, industrial strife, and strikes, in our opinion, will occur if the Congress of the United States adopts Senate Joint Resolution 113. We hold that the adoption of this joint resolution will represent a complete retreat and surrender to reactionary forces. Such action at this critical period of the Nation's history is unthinkable. Instead, we must go forward, attacking vigorously the problem of unemployment until we overcome it and achieve success.

We pledge to you, Mr. President, a full measure of support in your efforts to secure a continuation of the National Recovery Act for 2 years, with the suggested amendments which experience has shown are necessary. We will support you without reservation in your patriotic and constructive fight to achieve this legislative objective.

INVESTIGATION OF AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS—REPORT

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, last fall a subcommittee of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs of the Senate went to the Philippine Islands. I have a separate report, as a member of the subcommittee, which I desire to have printed in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD, and also that it may be printed as a Senate document.

I also ask to have printed at the end of the report a newspaper article which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed as a Senate document (S. Doc. No. 57) and to be printed in the RECORD, with the accompanying newspaper article, as follows:

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

As a member of a subcommittee of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs of the Senate, appointed at the request of the President in pursuance of a resolution of the Philippine Legislature asking that a committee or subcommittee visit the Philippines and make an investigation and report to the Congress on the subject of possible "inequalities or injustices" of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, approved March 24, 1934, I beg to state that in company with Senator TYDINGS, chairman, Senator MCADOO, and Senator GIBSON, I visited the islands, and, with them, made as thorough an investigation of the conditions in the islands as possible in the time of our command. Not agreeing in all respects with the other members of the subcommittee, I desire to submit a separate report. It is proper to say that Senator CARL HAYDEN, of Arizona, was also a member of the subcommittee; but he visited the Philippines last summer, and has already made a report of his findings.

VISIT OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE

Our subcommittee left Los Angeles on November 14, 1934. We stopped at Honolulu, and stayed in Hawaii 4 or 5 days. Then we went to Yokohama, where we landed on November 22. We drove to Tokyo, and, after spending 2 days there, took a train, going through what is known as industrial Japan, sometimes called the heart of Japan, and rejoined our ship at Kobe. From there we went to Shanghai, stopping over a day and night; then to Hong Kong, where we spent a day and night.

We landed at Manila on December 9. We spent some 3 weeks in the Philippines. We visited the four largest islands in person, taking the evidence of all aggrieved persons who desired to be heard, making inquiries from all possible sources, receiving memorials from various citizens, corporations, public and quasi-public bodies, conferring daily with leaders, talking informally with all classes of people, Filipinos, Americans, and any others who wished to be heard. I think we obtained a very good picture of the economic, social, financial, and political condition of the islands.

Specifically, we visited in person the islands of Luzon, Panay, Negros, and Mindanao.

During our stay we had the most efficient and cordial aid of the present Governor General of the islands, Gov. Frank Murphy, and of his entire and most efficient staff. It is due Governor Murphy to state here that he is making a splendid Governor of the islands. He has become a great student of Filipino affairs, is popular with all classes of people, is able, alert, courageous; and so far as I could see and learn, no one is better posted concerning the islands and their problems than is he.

We also had the active aid and advice of Gen. Frank Parker, commander of our armed forces in the islands. He is a very energetic, well-informed, and capable officer. Admirals Upham and Allen also gave us most courteous aid, and were most helpful in furnishing us information and advice.

The president of the Philippine Senate, Manuel L. Quezon—well known in the United States, where he served long and faithfully in Washington as Delegate from the islands—is a fine man, able, gifted, eloquent, and with the most remarkably delightful personality. He gave us every aid and help in his power. Messrs. Osmeña, Roxas, Alunan, Paredes, and many other able Filipino leaders, as well as judges of the supreme court—among whom were Judge Thomas A. Street, an American, and Chief Justice Avanceña, a pure Filipino—were most helpful and courteous. They gave us much information.

We also talked several times with General Aguinaldo, the Filipino leader prior to and during the Spanish-American War. Although General Aguinaldo is no longer a young man, he is still powerful and helpful. We had the benefit of his views. We also conferred with leaders in business, in banking, in professional life, in agriculture, in education, in newspaper work, and in every walk of life.

Practically all those whom we consulted wanted Philippine independence; but all, or practically all, expressed the greatest fears in the event of independence on three important subjects:

One was the fear of economic collapse if the Filipinos should not secure a trade agreement under which they could indefinitely sell their products free of duty in America after their independence was granted.

A second fear was of outside aggression. In other words, if given independence without an army or a navy or an air corps, and admittedly being unable financially to build up a military defense strong enough for their protection, they greatly fear the islands would be overrun and taken over by a stronger military and naval power.

A third fear is that the islands could not stand the export tax levied under the Tydings Act for the payment of their unpaid bonds which the United States Government had substantially and morally guaranteed.

HISTORY AND PRESENT CONDITIONS OF THE PHILIPPINES

The Filipino people are Malays. How long they have inhabited the islands is not definitely known, but some of them were there probably many hundreds of years ago. In 1570, Legaspi, acting for Spain, took over the islands, and for about 329 years after that time the islands were under the absolute control of Spain. When they were taken over there were about 500,000 people in the islands. Incidentally, the islands themselves are something more than 7,000 in number. Spain ruled the Filipinos until 1898—as I stated before, a period of 329 years—and when the Spanish rule ceased there were about 6,700,000 people in the islands.

Spain gave them little except the Christian religion. She did give most of them that. Theirs is the only Christian nation in the Far East. According to the census of 1918, there were about nine and one-half million Christians in the islands. The remainder were either Moslems or pagans. At the present time the Christians compose about 91 percent of the population, the Moslems about 4 percent, and the pagans about 5 percent.

Prior to the Spanish rule the Portuguese, the English, the Chinese, the Japanese, and the Dutch had severally attempted to obtain control of the islands; but, with the exception of the Chinese, their stay left little impression. The Chinese have always traded in the islands and are still among their leading merchants and traders, though they are now being rapidly supplanted by the Japanese. Apparently, Spanish control was never beneficial to the Filipinos. During that occupation they gained little in moral fiber, in education, or in wealth. They were constantly revolting against Spanish rule, and had been engaged in a revolution led by General Aguinaldo shortly before Dewey sank the Spanish Fleet in Manila Bay May 1, 1898. Just prior to Admiral Dewey's celebrated victory, however, the Spanish Government had made a treaty with General Aguinaldo by which peace was restored, and the Spanish Government paid to General Aguinaldo the sum of $400,000 to compensate the Filipinos for certain losses and to restore good feeling.

It is proper to say at this point that the members of the subcommittee, during their recent visit, were entertained by General Aguinaldo in his home at Cavite. The general is about 65 years of age, looks about 45, and is a quiet, modest man. He has a lovely family and home, and was most cordial and hospitable to us. He is tremendously interested in immediate Philippine independence. He does not want to wait at all, and is willing to take independence on the chance of being able to protect the islands, both economically and from being overrun by other powers. General Aguinaldo frankly stated, however, that he realized the danger from both sources. The day we were at his home 5,000 of his old soldiers were present, dressed in uniform, and they marched in front of the house for our benefit. It was said that they came from all parts of the islands voluntarily, and at their own expense, to take part in the parade. It is also fair to state that General Aguinaldo made a good impression on the subcommittee.

Returning to the Filipinos and their questions generally, the great body of them are Malay, speaking some 60 dialects. Attempts have been made to divide the Filipinos into tribes. I do not believe this can be done. They all look much the same, whether Tagalog, Moro, or Igorrote. So far as my unpracticed eye could discern, they all looked alike, being much the same in build, in color, in habits, and in customs. They are for the most part a quiet, gentle, hard-working and worthy people. I believe they are probably the most enlightened of all the Malays, certainly the most so of all those I saw, and I visited several Malay countries. Since American occupation, nearly 37 years ago, they have evidently made real progress in wealth, in standards of living, in education, in population, in the development of their natural resources, and in their ambitions and ideals of life. Certainly this is true of the better classes of their population. Under American direction and control, and especially since the Jones Act passed in 1916, giving them a virtual autonomy of government with an American governor, they have done well in the conduct of their government. It is true that this in a measure was due to the leadership and guidance of the Governor General and the stabilizing influence of the able mixed supreme court.

The great body of the Filipinos—the farmers, the laborers, and the ordinary run of the people—apparently take little interest in government. On the other hand, they have some very able and constructive leaders who compare favorably with the leaders of other nations. They have some excellent and substantial business men, though most of their business is done by Chinese, Japanese, English, Americans, or mestizos. They have able and ingenious lawyers, some remarkably bright and active newspaper men, skillful doctors, and members of other professions. Under the leadership and inspiration of America they have acquired an excellent school system, fairly good schoolhouses, good teachers, some colleges, and quite a number of learned and literary men, some of these very able and gifted. Under the impulse of American precept and example they are making considerable headway in education. Their standards of living are much higher than those of any other eastern people. I visited, personally, many public schools, and know that they are doing very well in education. The teachers were usually Filipino women, with Filipino men superintendents, and English was taught. In more than a dozen schools the children sang songs like America and Philippines, My Philippines to the tune of Maryland, My Maryland.

In agriculture, however, the Filipinos are proceeding along lines of centuries ago. They plow with carabao. They do not even use horses and mules in their fields, much less agricultural machinery. They dig and grub, often knee-deep in water, planting rice grain by grain. After it has matured they reap it stalk by stalk, and then, in many cases, thresh it out with their feet. Rice is their principal crop.

For the most part the people live in villages composed of the most rickety kind of bamboo houses, with no sanitation, and necessarily very damp during the heavy rains of the rainy season. The people pay little attention to rain, however, and when their clothes get wet they let them dry on their bodies. They live principally on rice and fruits. Sugarcane is grown principally by the large planters or by the native farmers in the old way and turned over to the large planters or mills on a share basis. Coconut groves are everywhere. As the Filipinos are overwhelmingly farming people, it is seen that this portion of them, living and digging as they do, cannot be much concerned in governmental affairs. Twenty-nine percent of the people are engaged in domestic or personal service. These figures are taken from a recent book by former Senator Hawes. Thus, quite three-fourths of the people are so situated that it is impossible for them to take much part in government, and, so far as I could tell, they are unfitted to do so. Former Senator Hawes, on page 69 of his book, says that 11 percent of the people are engaged in professional occupations. While I think this figure is high, this class constitutes the ruling class, and I should say its members are fitted for self-government, other things being conducive thereto. The remainder of the people are little concerned in public affairs of any kind.

In connection with agriculture, it should be said that the Filipinos export 60 percent of all they raise, and 86 percent of this 60 percent goes to America free of duty. It is seen, therefore, how absolutely dependent these people are on the tax-free markets in America. They sell in our markets about twice as much as they buy from us, their sales being largely of sugar, copra, tobacco, and hemp.

The islands are very rich in natural resources, and at this time the common people—and, indeed, all of the people—seem to be unusually prosperous. In my judgment, they will be, as long as they have free American markets in which to sell their sugar, copra, tobacco, and hemp.

The lands are most productive. Their sugarcane compares favorably with the sugarcane of Hawaii, Java, or any other sugarcane-raising country. Their coconuts are as good as or better than the coconuts of other countries. Their hemp is world-famous. They have 45 sugar factories, or "centrals", as they are called in the islands. On the island of Negros there is almost an aristocracy of wealth, due to the large number of sugarcane factories and rich cane plantations. These growers and manufacturers pay good wages, keep up their lands and properties in fine style, and apparently their tenants and share-croppers are a happy and prosperous people. The leaders of the island of Negros, such as Mr. Aluman, well-known in Washington, are powerful and influential men. In a somewhat less degree the same thing is true of the sugar plants and factories and coconut groves of Luzon and Panay.

On account of a typhoon we did not see Cebu, but our information is that this island, like Negros, is one of the most prosperous islands in the group. We went by Mindanao, and its coconut groves are truly wonderful. We did not see Basilan; but we were told that the rubber plantations on this island, which is just south of Mindanao, have been very successful.

In Luzon gold is being mined most successfully in large quantities, $11,000,000 worth having been mined in 1934. It is said that the next year's output is estimated at $17,500,000. The gold mines are literally booming.

The forests of the Philippines contain enormous quantities of the finest timber, it being estimated that on Government lands alone there are now more than 8,900,000,000 feet of splendid timber.

The surrounding waters are full of the finest fish, although, strange to say, the Filipinos import fish! All of these waters, however, are thickly dotted with Japanese fishing vessels.

Within a radius of 2,000 miles of Manila there live 650,000,000 people; within a radius of 2,500 miles there live 910,000,000 people; and within a radius of 3,000 miles there live more than a billion people—indeed, more than half the population of the world. What a center of trade and commerce these islands could be made.

WHAT AMERICA HAS DONE FOR THE ISLANDS

After taking over the islands in our treaty with Spain, we paid Spain the sum of $20,000,000 for them.

The pacification of the islands several years after Dewey's fleet sank the Spanish fleet cost 4,165 good American lives.

The occupation and pacification of the islands from May 1, 1898, to June 30, 1902, cost, in money, $190,000,000.

Since pacification, the expenditures of the United States Army and Navy in the Philippines are estimated at $614,000,000.

The total cost to the United States, including all departments of the Government which have made expenditures in the islands, from the date of occupation to June 30, 1934, is approximately $835,000,000.

In addition to this, the balance of trade has always or practically always been against us and in favor of the islands, and in recent years this balance of trade has cost American consumers about $30,000,000 per year.

The Tydings Act wiped out all these implied obligations. We have never taxed the Filipinos a single cent, except the recent excise tax on copper and oil, and under the law taxing them these taxes go to the Philippine government. We have never made a cent out of the islands; and yet, under the Tydings Act, we turn over to the Filipinos every dollar of our property in the islands, except a naval station, and will ultimately, of course, turn that back also. We have been generous to the Filipinos beyond comprehension; and yet we are asked to enter a trade agreement which will continue after their national independence, and under which the American people will continue to tax themselves for the purpose of keeping the Filipino people prosperous and successful indefinitely.

It may not be accurate to say that these are the richest islands in all the world, or the most fortunately situated; but certainly the statement is within the bounds of truth that there are no richer or more valuable islands on the face of the globe, and none better situated so far as trade and commerce are concerned. Americans who have not been to the islands cannot visualize their possibilities. Filipinos who have not studied their economic or political problems—and some seven-eighths of them have not studied these questions—cannot overrate the mistake they are likely to make by overturning the present political and economic set-up.

It is important, therefore, for both Filipinos and Americans to weigh most carefully these problems. The Filipinos are at the parting of the ways. The action now taken will either cause them to continue to be a progressive, prosperous, happy, and contented people or it may cause them to revert to their unhappy state before America took them over and instituted among their people the most altruistic and unselfish course ever adopted toward a subject people at any time in the world's history.

It should here be said that from the beginning of our occupation of the islands our leaders have continually promised the Filipinos a greater and greater degree of independence, and eventually national independence. The American people generally have felt that as soon as the Filipinos showed themselves capable of self-government they would be given independence. The Congress, in the Jones Act, gave them the largest measure of self-government. At the present time more than 98 percent of the employees of the Philippine government are Filipinos. The American Government now retains sovereignty, a Governor General, a Vice Governor, an insular auditor, and a slight majority of the members of the supreme court. These act as stabilizers and as instructors and helpers. The Filipinos, however, are not satisfied with present conditions and want America to get out of the islands entirely and give them immediate, complete, and national independence.

In 1933 Senator Hawes secured the passage of what was known as the "Hawes-Cutting Act", giving the Filipinos an independent government.

THE HAWES ACT

This act (Public, No. 311, 72d Cong.) became a law on January 17, 1933. It was entitled "An act to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes."

The act provided for the election, by or before January 17, 1934, of delegates to a convention to draft a constitution for the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands. This constitution was required to be republican in form, and to contain a bill of rights, as well as certain provisions governing relations with the United States pending the complete withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States over the islands, which was to occur 10 years after the inauguration of the new Philippine government. Meanwhile provision was to be made for absolute religious toleration; property of the United States and property used for religious, charitable, or educational purposes was to be exempt from taxation; a limit was to be placed upon the indebtedness of the islands; existing obligations were to be assumed by the new government;

English was to be taught in the public schools; certain important acts were not to become law until approved by the President; foreign affairs were to be under the direct supervision and control of the United States, which was permitted "to maintain military and other reservations and armed forces" in the islands and to call upon the military forces of the new government when required; the decisions of the islands' courts were to be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States; the United States was to be allowed to intervene to maintain constitutional government, protect life, property, individual liberty, etc.; and citizens and corporations of the United States were to have equal rights in the islands with Philippine citizens and corporations.

After the approval of the new constitution in the Philippine Islands it was to be submitted to the President of the United States, who was to determine whether or not it complied with the requirements of the act. If he decided this question in the affirmative, an election was to be held by the Filipinos in which they were "to vote directly for or against the proposed constitution." In case of a favorable vote, duly certified to the President, he was to issue a proclamation announcing this fact; and upon the issuance of this proclamation the new Philippine government was to come into existence. Thereupon all the property and rights of the United States in the Philippines—except certain military and other reservations—were to become the property of the new government.

After the inauguration of the new government, trade relations between the two countries were to be "as now provided by law, subject to the following exceptions":

Annual quotas were provided for the importation into the United States, free of duty, of certain important Philippine products, the excess above the quotas to pay the same rates of duty as like articles imported into the United States from foreigng countries. These quotas were as follows:

Refined sugars, 50,000 long tons.

Unrefined sugars, 800,000 long tons.

Coconut oil, 200,000 long tons.

Manila and similar yarn, twine, cord, cordage, rope, and cable, 3,000,000 pounds.

Provision was made for allocation among Philippine producers in case the importations into the United States exceeded the quotas.

The importation of the above products was to be free to the amount of the quotas. All other products—and this is most important—were to continue to enjoy free and unrestricted entry into our markets.

An export tax for the benefit of the Philippines was provided for on articles coming into the United States free of duty, this export tax beginning during the sixth year after inauguration of the new government at 5 percent of the United States tariff rates on such articles coming from foreign countries, and increasing by graduations to 25 percent in the ninth year after inauguration of the new government; this export tax to be placed in a sinking fund for the purpose of paying, with other available moneys, the bonded indebtedness of the Philippines and their political subdivisions.

Pending complete withdrawal of the United States—

(1) Amendments to the Philippine constitution were to be submitted to the President for approval, and he was to have authority to suspend the operation of any act of the new government which was likely to result in failure to fulfill its contracts, or to pay interest or principal of the bonded indebtedness of the islands, or to impair their currency, or to violate international obligations of the United States.

(2) The chief executive of the new government was to make annual reports of its operations to the President and Congress of the United States, and other reports upon request.

(3) The President was to appoint a high commissioner to the Philippines, who was to be the representative of the President in the islands, have access to their records, be furnished information requested by him, and make annual reports to the President and Congress, and other reports upon direction of the President.

(4) The new government was to designate a resident commissioner to the United States, who was to have a seat in the House of Representatives, with right of debate, but without right of voting.

(5) Cases from the Philippines were to be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States as formerly.

(6) An annual quota of 50 persons was provided for immigrants from the Philippines to the United States, and for immigration purposes they were to be considered a foreign country.

(7) There was to be no obligation on the part of the United States to meet interest or principal of the bonds of the Philippine government or its political subdivisions issued after the taking effect of the act and during continuance of United States sovereignty, but they were not to be exempt from taxation by the United States.

On the 4th of July following the expiration of the 10-year period from the inauguration of the new government, the United States was to withdraw completely from the islands (except as to land or property redesignated by the President as military or other reservations), and to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as a separate and self-governing nation, provided the new constitution made provision for the equitable settlement of questions of property rights between the two countries and their citizens, for the assumption by the new government of the debts incurred by the islands during the sovereignty of the United States, and for the discharge by the new government of obligations assumed by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain which ceded the islands to the United States.

Section 11, a very important one, requested the President of the United States at the earliest practicable date, to enter into negotiations with foreign powers with a view to the conclusion of a treaty for the perpetual neutralization of the Philippine Islands if and when their independence should have been achieved.

After the complete independence of the Philippines, their products imported into the United States were to pay the same duties as those paid by the products of other foreign countries, provision being made for a conference between the two countries for the purpose of formulating recommendations as to future trade relations between the two countries.

The Philippine Legislature met and rejected the Hawes Act, and national independence seems, for the time, to have been given up.

THE TYDINGS ACT

This act (Public, No. 127, 73d Cong.) was approved on March 24, 1934. It was entitled "An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes."

The act followed in all substantial respects the provisions of the Hawes Act, being for the most part word for word the same, with certain transpositions which do not affect the substance of the act.

Instead of not later than January 17, 1934, the time within which delegates to the constitutional convention might be elected was fixed at not later than October 1, 1934.

Another difference was that while section 10 of the Hawes Act provided for the retention after independence of "such land or property reserved under section 5 as may be redesignated by the President of the United States not later than 2 years after the date of such proclamation", viz, the proclamation of withdrawal, section 10 of the Tydings Act provided for the retention after independence of "such naval reservations and fueling stations as are reserved under section 5", and provided for negotiations between the two governments after independence for the settlement of questions relating thereto.

REASONS GIVEN FOR REJECTION OF THE HAWES ACT

The reasons given by the Philippine Legislature for rejecting the Hawes Act are thus stated in the Annual Report of the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934:

"The Philippine Independence Act (Public, No. 311, 72d Cong.), known as the "Hawes-Cutting Act", enacted January 17, 1933, was rejected by a concurrent resolution of the Philippine Legislature on October 17, 1933, which declined to accept the act because "in the opinion of the legislature, the law does not satisfy the national aspirations nor does it safeguard the welfare of the Filipino people or the stability of the social, economic, and political institutions of their country"; and because of specific objections to provisions of the act relative to immigration, military, and other reservations, powers of the high commissioner, and trade relations between the islands and the United States. The act lapsed on January 17, 1934, 1 year after its enactment by Congress.

"The Philippine Legislature, in the concurrent resolution rejecting the Hawes-Cutting Act, also named a legislative committee to come to the United States and 'express to the Government and people of the United States the objections to the said law and the reasons therefor, and petition the President and the Congress of the United States for changes therein or the enactment of such new legislation as will fully satisfy the aspirations of the Filipino people to become at the earliest practicable date a free and independent nation, under conditions and circumstances that will not imperil the political, social, and economic stability of their country.' This committee arrived in the United States in November 1933, and for the next several months directed its efforts toward securing the enactment of further independence legislation along lines that would be more acceptable to the Filipino people."

"The Philippine Independence Act (Public, No. 127) enacted by the Seventy-third Congress, and commonly known as the 'Tydings-McDuffie Act', was approved by the President on March 24, 1934. Under the provisions of section 17 the act became effective upon its acceptance by the Philippine Legislature on May 1, 1934. The Philippine people are now carrying out the further steps provided in the act, the initial one being the election of delegates to a constitutional convention. This election was held on July 10. At the time of writing this report the convention, which assembled on July 30, 1934, is engaged in drafting the constitution for the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

"One of the provisions of the Independence Act that became immediately effective upon its acceptance was that contained in section 8 relating to immigration of Filipinos to the United States, which places them on the status of aliens as regards entry into the United States, and allots to the Philippine Islands a quota of 50 for each fiscal year."

NO "INEQUALITIES" OR "INJUSTICES" IN THE INDEPENDENCE ACTS

The two independence acts have been summarized in detail because of their great importance in this connection. In large part the language of the acts themselves has been used in the summarization.

No fair-minded person reading this summarization, or the acts themselves, and considering them in the light of the history, geography, and economic condition of the islands, can come to the conclusion that there are any substantial "inequalities" or "injustices" in them.

It must be remembered that at the time of the passage of each of these acts, and for a number of years theretofore, there had been a growing demand in the United States, largely because of the beet sugar interests in Western States, that this country should withdraw from the islands, refrain from assuming any responsibility for their future protection or welfare, and require all Philippine importations into the United States to pay exactly the same rates of duty as the products of any other country. Many in this country believed that we had made a great mistake in ever assuming sovereignty over the islands. The difficulty of defending them in case of war with a maritime nation and the ever-increasing competition of Philippine products with those of continental United States were urged, among other things, as imperative reasons for taking at their word the Filipino leaders who demanded independence, summarily withdrawing from the islands, and, in fact—though it was not so stated in words—abandoning them to their fate in a world where other nations were likely, for their own benefit, to take advantage of the helpless condition of the islands.

Instead of yielding to these demands and consulting only the welfare of the United States, this country has accepted many heavy responsibilities during the time which is to elapse before complete independence. It has given the products of the islands free access to the markets of the United States, the richest in the world, save for a few products as to which quotas are established. It has sought in every way possible to act for the real welfare of the islands instead of taking the easy course of immediate and complete withdrawal.

So far, therefore, from charging the United States with seeking to inflict upon the Philippines "inequalities" or "injustices" in the legislation granting independence, the Filipino leaders should be, and I believe many of them are, sincerely grateful for the unexampled liberality of this country in dealing with their nation. If there be some minor matters requiring further adjustment between the two countries, the United States unquestionably will lend an attentive ear to their presentation, and will be glad to do what equity and justice require; but it is my conviction, after careful study of both the acts and the facts and circumstances concerning independence, that it is wholly unfair and inaccurate to allege that any substantial "inequalities" or "injustices" are contained in the Tydings Act which ought to be cured by amendment if the Filipinos insist on national independence.

The Tydings Act was not only agreed to by the Filipinos before its passage, but on the floors of both the House and the Senate their Resident Commissioners privately urged its passage. The "injustices and inequalities" are all against the United States and not against the Philippines.

We find upon investigation that the Filipino leaders are still not satisfied with the act. They desire to have stricken from it the export-tax provision, by which tax it is proposed that the Philippines shall pay, before final independence, the remaining $51,500,000 of Philippine bonds on which the United States is morally obligated by way of security. In my judgment, to do this would be totally and wholly unfair to the United States, and would end by our making a gift of that sum to the Philippines.

Next, the Filipino leaders want the economic provision changed or added to so that the Philippines may continue to have a free market in America for their sugar, copra, hemp, and other products after final independence. In my judgment, to do this would be without precedent in all history, would be unfair and unjust to the beet-sugar producers of the United States, and would be unfair to Cuba, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico. It is true that these leaders say if the islands had to pay our tariff taxes on sugar even in part it would bring about the economic annihilation of the islands. I am sure they are correct in this contention; but the answer to it is that they cannot have their cake and eat it, too.

Upon our return we came through the island of Java, which is perhaps the largest sugar-raising district in the world. Its production in recent years ran up as high as 3,000,000 tons per year. Holland, which owns the island, has had to fix a quota production, and this year that production is limited to 500,000 tons, because Java can find no adequate market for her sugar.

Because of high standards of living and high labor costs, the Philippine Islands cannot compete with Java in raising sugar or in raising coconuts. Hence, it is almost certain that without free American markets the Filipinos must quit raising sugar and coconuts, revert to rice raising only, and necessarily to lower standards of living.

As I look at the situation about the Philippines, what will it profit the Filipinos to obtain national independence if, at the same time, they make uncertain their economic welfare and possibly bring about their ruin? High standards of living, and bumper crops sold in a free market at high prices, bringing prosperity and happiness to all their people are far better than a weak fling at national independence, or even a local dictatorship. Especially is this true when the Filipinos are now enjoying such an excellent local self-government—the first they have ever enjoyed—and an independence and freedom, I venture to say, which is not enjoyed to a greater extent by any people on the face of the globe. When the free markets of the Philippines are gone, when their balances of trade are no longer favorable, attendant want and poverty will come, and their so-called "national independence" will fade out as a dream which failed to come true.

Again I say, they are independent now—more independent than perhaps half the peoples of the world.

AMERICA'S OCCUPATION OF THE PHILIPPINES

Since we bought the islands over 36 years ago, no country in the history of time has ever been governed more altruistically or more generously than America has governed the Philippines. We have never sought to profit by them in the slightest degree. We have governed them with an eye single to their advancement and their betterment physically, morally, financially, governmentally, and in every other possible respect. We have disregarded the enormous cost to ourselves in performing what Americans believe was a trust. We desired to set an example of a great government's treatment of a dependency. Our course has always been determined by what was to the best interests of the Filipino people. In my judgment, Americans still feel that way. After the most careful examination of the facts and the most careful thought as to their conditions, I am convinced that this great experiment which we have been making for over 36 years and which has already done such wonderful things for the Filipino people, will all be destroyed and pass away as "a tale that is told" should the Philippines insist upon the bargain that has already been made, giving them national independence at this time.

Such are the facts. In view of them, what will happen if the Tydings Act goes into force unamended?—and I see no possible grounds on which it could be amended as the Filipinos desire to have it amended. As I have shown, we have already been the most generous Nation toward them in all the history of time.

CONSEQUENCES OF INDEPENDENCE

If the Tydings Act goes into effect, I sum up what will happen:

The United States will withdraw from the Philippines, bag and baggage, and leave the Filipinos to defend themselves or to be taken over by some stronger power. We cannot, without running great risks, keep a naval station there for the protection of the islands. One of these risks is war with some foreign country. Another is having the Filipinos themselves contend that inasmuch as they have allowed us to have a naval station on the islands, it is our duty to defend the islands for all time.

If the Filipinos are given national independence there will be no need or justification for the retention of a naval station when our country has no interests there to protect.

All Americans and American interests in the islands will be left to shift for themselves under a new Philippine government, or under whatever foreign government may take over the islands.

America will give up, before the task is done, one of the greatest and most altruistic and most successful experiments ever made in the government of a dependent people.

America will leave in the lurch a people she promised to protect.

She will permit her wards, the Filipino people, to commit economic suicide.

She knows, and the Filipino leaders know, that the granting of so-called "national independence" by our Government will mean simply a change from benevolent and successful government by our country to an arbitrary and oppressive rule by some other powerful nation.

The attitude of Japan toward the Philippines cannot be accurately stated; but the bald fact is that 15,000 or more Japanese are in Davao now, and they virtually control that Province. Japanese merchants and fishermen and agents are all over the islands, and are constantly increasing in power and influence. Should Japan not take over the islands, the withdrawal of the United States means that they will be easy victims of the rapaciousness of any other nation that may want them, as, confessedly, the Filipinos are not able to organize, maintain, and support an army or a navy or an effective air corps.

I voted for Mr. Bryan in 1900 on his platform of anti-imperialism. I thought our purchase of the Philippines in 1898 was a mistake. Had I been in the Senate when the treaty came up for ratification, I no doubt should have voted against the treaty. I have always supported Philippine autonomy to the last degree possible. I supported the Jones Act in 1916. That act has been a success. When the Hawes Act and the Tydings Act were before the Senate, with little study or consideration of the problems involved, I voted for both, believing the statements made on the floor that the Philippines were ready for independence. From this it can be seen what my views were when I went out to visit the Philippines last fall. My visit to the islands has conclusively convinced me that national independence is not now best for the Philippine Islands.

While the Filipinos have done well in managing their affairs under American guidance, they cannot at this time successfully govern themselves as a wholly independent nation. They have no semblance of a navy now, and because of their financial situation they are not now, and will not be for many years, able to build a navy. Even if they had one, they could not build it large enough to protect themselves. It is true that they have a Philippine constabulary; but this is necessary for purely domestic purposes, and could not be organized into an army sufficient to protect them. They have no air corps, and, of course, are not able to build one. In the present condition of international affairs, in my judgment, immediately after becoming independent the Philippines will be taken over by some other nation.

But there is another reason, even more compelling, why the islands should not have national independence at this time. It is the economic reason. The new government, to be a success, must have the funds necessary to run it. At the present time the Filipino people are absolutely dependent for their success and prosperity on the free markets in America for their sugar, copra, and cordage; and these free markets they cannot hold, or even expect to hold, with complete national independence.

In this situation a new independent national government could not live, and the Filipinos would soon be either in revolution or under the dominion and control of some other nation, and, perhaps, both.

While these are the two main reasons against independence at this time, there are others. The first of these is the lack of sufficient education and experience on the part of the masses of the people to enable them to govern themselves. They never have governed themselves. Probably 60 percent, perhaps more, of the people above 10 years of age cannot read or write, even with all the encouragement in educational matters they have received from the United States, and all the progress that has been made by them.

The Filipinos confessedly are not ready for a democratic or republican form of government. In their draft of the new constitution, which was shown to me, they specifically admit this by providing for a dictatorship. Of course, the new constitution would not provide for a dictatorship if their leaders did not know, as every well-informed person must know, that a dictatorship would be necessary. Indeed, from my observation and information, it is the only practicable form of government they could have at this time even if outside aggressors let them alone.

Since writing the above, I have been informed that Senator Quezon, after learning of my report, has had that provision of the constitution as drafted and passed stricken out.

To give the Filipinos complete national independence now would be to cause the complete loss of all they have gained during the 36 years of American occupation; and I believe no one familiar with the situation will deny that they have gained much.

POSSIBLE ALTERNATIVES

It was claimed by some of their leaders that the Filipinos can accept the Tydings Act and obviate the economic difficulties in this way: The United States, having fixed a quota of 950,000 tons of sugar for the Philippines under the Costigan Act, it is urged that that provision of the act supersedes the Tydings Act pro tanto; that the provision of the Costigan Act referred to probably will remain in full force after complete independence, and that under that provision the 950,000 tons of sugar will continue to come in free under the new national government.

Certainly there was no such intention on the part of Congress in the passage of the Costigan Act. I do not believe the Costigan Act will have that effect. No suggestion of such a purpose was made at the time of its passage. If it should have that effect, however, it is certain that the Congress will change it when the Filipinos become nationally independent. To take any other course would be unfair to our own other sugar-producing territories, unfair to the beet-sugar sections of the United States, and exceedingly unfair to Cuba. Incidentally, I may mention the fact that under the Costigan Act, Cuba's quota is fixed at 1,950,000 tons, but those sugars do not come in free. Cuba pays the tariff taxes provided by law, and of course the Philippines also will pay the tariff tax when they are similarly situated.

It was also claimed that the export provision of the Tydings Act must necessarily be repealed. Certainly it is not an "injustice" or an "inequality." On the contrary, that provision is absolutely necessary in the event of the national independence of the islands. Not to have it would not only be unfair and unjust to the bondholders who took the bonds on the faith of the United States standing behind them but to repeal it would be just to make a gift of some $51,500,000 to the Filipinos. The United States will have to stop playing Santa Claus some time.

TYDINGS ACT ACCEPTED

The Filipinos, however, have accepted the Tydings Act as it is. Congress gave them the privilege of accepting it, and that matter is ended. In my opinion, the United States is bound by the Tydings Act and its acceptance. So are the Philippines bound. Under that act the last vestige of right we have in the Philippines is the right to retain a naval station, which we may or may not use.

I recommend that by an independent joint resolution the President be authorized to convey any such right to a naval station to the Philippines immediately upon their becoming nationally independent, if they persist in taking that step. We should either get out of the Philippines entirely or we should stay there with full power to protect and defend the Filipinos and the American residents in the islands. We should let the Filipinos know now that if they obtain national independence it is not our duty and we do not propose to protect them with our Army, our Navy, or our Air Corps, and that if they have a national government of their own we are not going to treat them differently economically than the way we treat Cuba and other independent nations.

IF INDEPENDENT THE PHILIPPINES MUST ACCEPT THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF INDEPENDENCE

We must not directly or indirectly lead the Filipinos to believe that after giving them complete national independence we are going expressly or impliedly to agree to defend them with our Army, our Navy, or our Air Corps; nor must we for a moment let them believe that in order to sustain their national independence and to keep their people prosperous we are going to give them free markets in America.

I am informed that a majority of the subcommittee is in favor of entering into a trade agreement with the Philippines now providing that Philippine sugar to the extent of 950,000 tons shall be allowed to come into the United States for the transition period of 10 years, and thereafter until the agreement may be abrogated. Most emphatically I cannot recommend such an agreement. As already stated, such an agreement would be unfair to our beet-sugar interests, to Hawaii, to Puerto Rico, and to Cuba, whose position is like that of the Philippines. Cuba pays these tariff duties now, and when the Philippines become nationally independent they will have to do likewise.

Again, to make such an agreement so long in advance would be a gross injustice to the American people generally. As a matter of law, it is doubtful whether such an agreement can be made before complete national independence of the Philippines; but for the present the legal point may be dismissed. The merits of the case forbid our making such an agreement. If the Filipinos, after all we have done for them, want to take a chance on paddling their own canoe by becoming nationally independent, that is their responsibility, not ours; and it is our duty to look out after our own interests. We certainly have been generous to them in the past, and we have never exploited them to the extent of one penny. We should now tell them, if they want to leave us, that we wish them well, and that we shall be glad to trade with them and deal with them as we do with other free and independent nations.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS TO THE TYDINGS ACT

My opinion is that in seeking independence now the Filipinos are making a monumental mistake. If I were advising them, I should tell them to come before the Congress and ask for amendments to the Tydings Act (a) leaving sovereignty in control of the United States; (b) leaving foreign relations, army, navy, and air affairs entirely to the United States; (c) leaving tariff and immigration entirely to the United States; (d) providing for a supreme court divided in membership as now; (e) putting restrictions on the new government's grants of public property and franchises and its issues of bonds. This would give their new government an impregnable position and fix a guaranty of both its political and economic stability. Then I should advise them to leave the present constitution, with certain amendments, to make it accord fully with the Tydings Act.

It may be objected that this plan would not give the new government much to do. Quite the contrary is true. In the first place, it would give the Filipinos a president who would be a native—and probably the first president would be Mr. Quezon. As president, he would perform all of the duties that the Governor General now performs, except as to the powers above reserved. These reserved powers would be performed by the High Commissioner representing the President of the United States and the Government of the United States.

In the next place, the plan outlined would furnish a defense of the islands that no native government could possibly give. It would settle, in the interest of the Filipinos, the economic questions heretofore referred to which are so vital to their prosperity and even to their life.

VIEWS OF ELPIDIO QUIRINO

Still it may be contended that reservation to the United States of the powers mentioned would not leave much for the Philippine government to do. Such a claim is untenable. I have recently read Economic Problems of the Philippines, published in 1934 by the Philippine Economic Association, with a preface by Elpidio Quirino, its president. This is a most interesting work from the Philippine point of view. In this work the following are stated as some of the functions over which a new Philippine government would have control and jurisdiction: Survey and subdivision of public lands; colonization of public lands; education, including vocational education; rural problems; forests and forest resources; mines and minerals; manufacturing and industries; fisheries; labor and population; domestic trade; transportation and communications; banks and credit facilities; public finance; post offices and post roads; taxes; animal resources; monetary system; public expenditures.

In all these matters, and many others, the new government would be supreme, independent, and wholly self-governing. The State of New York is not any more independent, or free. The new president would have his hands full in handling these and related problems. As showing how important and beneficial such a division of powers would be to the Philippines, I quote the following from Economic Problems of the Philippines:

"Foreign trade constitutes the basic foundation of the Philippine economic system. The decline of foreign trade would inevitably cause the collapse of, or create a serious disturbance in, our present economic structure.

"The greatest development came after 1909. In that year the free trade between the United States and Philippines was established. The United States Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act of 1909 provided that all articles grown, produced, and manufactured in the United States were to be admitted free of duty into the Philippine Islands without any restrictions. Free entry was also to be given to Philippine products in the United States market with certain restrictions, most of which were removed later by the Underwood tariff of 1913.

"The total foreign trade of the islands increased immediately from ₱124,000,000 in 1908 to ₱181,000,000 in 1910, the year after the free trade was established, this increase continuing steadily during the succeeding years.

"In 1912, the end of the second decade of American rule, Philippine foreign trade had reached the value of ₱467,587,387, or an increase of 254 percent over what it was at the beginning of that decade. Exports increased from ₱69,848,674 in 1909 to ₱270,388,964 in 1918, while imports for the same years rose from ₱62,168,838 to ₱197,198,423. The share of the United States in the total trade of the islands increased from 32 percent in 1909 to 63 percent in 1918. In 1909, 21 percent of the total imports of the islands was supplied by the United States, while 10 years later this amount had increased to 60 percent. The United States took 42 percent of the total exports of the islands in 1909 and 66 percent in 1918.

"In 1933, the United States took 86 percent of the total exports of the islands, the rest being distributed in small quantities among European and Far Eastern countries.

"Thus Philippine exports are now dependent almost entirely upon the United States market. The United States takes 90.9 percent of the islands' export of sugar, 66 percent of copra, 46 percent of tobacco, and almost all of the exports of coconut oil, and embroideries. Because of the concentration of the islands' development on lines of production intended to supply the American market, the production of articles for local consumption and for export to other countries has been largely neglected.

"Influence of free trade.—It is therefore, seen that the present free trade with the United States has been the great stimulating force in the development of Philippine commerce during the last 25 years. This special arrangement has caused the trade of the islands to flow mainly in the direction of the United States market. More than 80 percent of our total exports now go to the United States, and it is estimated that 88 percent of our exports to the United States is dependent upon the free trade. In other words, about 70 percent of our total exports at present exists only because of our free-trade relations with the United States.

"The Far East is the world's greatest potential market today, and every commercial nation is desirous of gaining a strong and permanent foothold in this market. America is in the far-eastern trade to stay. Its trade in the Far East has attained considerable proportions, representing in value at present about $1,000,000,000 a year. In 1930, it reached $2,407,553,000. This trade represents nearly one-fourth of the total foreign trade of the United States. In 1932 it was exactly 23.18 percent. American trade with the Far East far exceeds that with South America and the former evidently holds more attraction and a brighter promise as a field for trade expansion. The United States has built up a big mercantile marine for service in the Pacific trade, and thus the factor of distance is not a serious hindrance to the continuation of Philippine-American commercial relations.

"The value of the Philippine market in the United States is now well known to American commercial interests. The Philippines is today the ninth best customer of the United States. It is among the principal outlets for American textiles. In 1932, the United States sold in the Philippine market $9,880,718 worth of cotton textiles, representing about one-fourth of the total cotton goods exports of the United States for that year. American manufactures of iron and steel, automobiles, radio, farm implements and machinery, and various lines of hardware, wheat flour, mineral oils, paper, and other articles and products of the United States also have a good market in the Philippines. Certainly, the United States would not so willingly relinquish her hold of this valuable market.

"During the 10-year period from 1885 to 1894 the value of the total Philippine-American trade was ₱122,415,204, of which ₱113,628,388 was the value of our exports to the United States and ₱8,786,816 was the value of our imports from that country.

"It is interesting to note in this connection that even in those early years preceding the period of American administration our exports to the United States far exceeded our imports from her. For the 10-year period mentioned we exported to the United States goods 14 times more in value than what we imported from her. This has, therefore, been the general condition of our trade balance with America throughout the past, with or without the free trade. Our principal exports to the United States then were sugar, hemp, leathers, tobacco, and indigo, while the most important articles imported from the United States were mineral oils, coal, canned goods, wheat flour, and iron and steel manufactures.

"In return for whatever tariff concessions or favors the United States will grant to our exports, the Philippines could also extend to selected American products entering our market such amount of protection or preferential treatment as may be found necessary to place the trade between the two Nations on a reciprocal basis.

"It is therefore imperative that changes be made in the act. Fortunately, the administration in Washington is disposed to give a fair hearing and full consideration of such necessary changes. President Roosevelt himself, in a special message to Congress, which led to the approval of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, stated that as regards the economic provisions of the law any imperfections and inequalities that exist 'can be corrected after a proper hearing and in fairness to both peoples.'

"The following changes should be secured:

"1. Complete elimination of subsection (e), section 6, providing for the imposition of an export tax during the last 5 years of the commonwealth.

"2. Amendment of subsections (a) and (e), section 6, by increasing the 800,000-ton limit for sugar to 926,000 long tons, as was recommended by the President of the United States to Congress; and raising the limitation for cordage from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 pounds.

"3. Amendment of subdivisions (5), (9), and (10) of subsection (a), section 2, so as to give full autonomy in tariff and fiscal matters to the Philippine commonwealth government so that the proper steps may be taken during the transition period to remedy existing inequalities in our foreign trade and to prepare for the general adoption of a permanent tariff and fiscal policy for the future independent government.

"4. Amendment of section 13 by fixing the time for the conference between representatives of the United States and the Philippines to formulate policies for future commercial relations between the two countries to at least 2 years, instead of 1 year, before the advent of complete independence. This will give more ample time to readjust our trade relations with the United States.

"As has been pointed out, our export trade has been the main support of our material prosperity. Unless timely measures are adopted to insure the continuance of at least a substantial portion of our present trade with the United States and to develop more extensively our other markets in Europe and the Far East, there is going to be a radical decline in the levels of income of the population and a corresponding drop in the general standard of living.

"2. We should secure changes and amendments of the economic provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie law to (a) eliminate the export tax, (b) increase the sugar limitation to 926,000 long tons and the cordage limitation to 5,000,000 pounds, (c) give full autonomy in tariff and fiscal matters to the commonwealth government, and (d) set the time for the United States-Philippine trade conference to 2 years prior to the advent of complete independence."

From these statements it is seen that there is no dispute about the economic situation in the Philippines. In asking for full, complete, and absolute national independence now, they, themselves, admit that it will ruin them; and they simply are hoping, like Mr. Micawber, that "something will turn up" to save their national and economic life.

VIEWS OF MANUEL QUEZON

I also quote from the Hon. Manuel Quezon (after the passage of the Hawes bill) as follows:

"In all sincerity, I must confess I am deeply apprehensive over the effects that the immediate termination of free trade with America will have upon our economic and social life. Especially do I feel thus because of the present world depression. The barring from the American market of the products of industries which were created and stimulated under the shelter of a protective American tariff cannot but affect our commerce. And consequently there will be lowering of wages and reduction in the income of the government, which is already being curtailed by the present depression. In a word, I am of the firm belief that with a sudden and abrupt termination of free trade with America, there will be created here a situation of extreme difficulty for the people and the government of the Philippines. And it is not just to impose on us this hardship."

Again, Mr. Quezon says:

"And right here, I want to say that I am more interested in securing the enactment of legislation beneficial to our country, that would definitely settle the Philippine question, in line with our national aspiration, even though it did not grant immediate, complete, and absolute independence, than in all the speeches and prospects about immediate independence, however brilliant and sincere, if, after all, nothing will come out from it."

I now quote from Senator Osmeña:

"A grant of independence will not require radical changes in the structure. Unless other forms of government were attempted, all that would be needed would be the election of a new executive."

COMPARISON WITH NEW YORK

There are about 14,000,000 people in the State of New York, substantially the same number as are in the Philippines. Probably 95 percent of the people over 10 years of age in New York can read and write. Practically all of them take the greatest possible interest in politics and government. There are probably no richer, no better educated, no more intelligent, no more capable people on the face of the earth than the citizens of New York. They are as free and independent as any people who have ever existed, yet they do not control their foreign affairs, nor do they have their own army, their own navy, or their own air corps for their protection. They do not fix their tariffs or their immigration laws, though the greatest part of all immigrants and goods come into our country through the ports of New York. If we are going to make an independent nation out of the 14,000,000 people in the Philippines, probably 60 percent of whom over 10 years of age cannot read or write, why should we not by the same token make an independent and separate nation of New York, with her 14,000,000 people? We should, of course, make the Philippines a self-governing and an independent people; but why should we give them powers and responsibilities greater than those enjoyed by the people of New York? I cannot see any justification in reason or experience for such a course, after having given the matter most careful thought, study, and my best examination.

VIEWS OF FORMER SENATOR HAWES

Former Senator Harry B. Hawes has written a book on the Philippines. He is a most earnest advocate of complete national independence of the islands; and yet he has this to say:

"But I wish to set down that I favor, and to the best of my abilities I will further, the independence of the Philippines on terms and conditions which will cause the least disarrangement in the economic relations between the United States and the islands" (p. 311).

This is good sense. We all know that at the present time complete national independence will not only cause a rupture of the economic relations now existing between the two countries, but it will probably cause a complete cessation and break-down of those relations. Why should we take a course so fraught with danger to the islands? They now have law, order, and justice, all meted out by themselves. They have a material well-being which they have never had before in all their history. They have a greater independence and security than they could ever possibly hope to have either under a dictatorship, as provided in their constitution, or under the control of a foreign nation.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

I conclude and recommend as follows:

1. That inasmuch as the Tydings Act has passed, proposing complete national independence, and has been accepted by the Philippine Legislature, as provided in the act, no other course is open to us than to complete the transaction, providing the conditions specified in the act are fully met.

2. Filipino leaders were in Washington when the act was passed. They urged its passage as meeting their approval. It was one of the most generous acts of one people toward another ever recorded in history. I find in the act no injustices or inequalities toward the Filipinos.

3. The act, in directing the President to convey to the Philippine government all property of the United States, expressly says, "except such naval reservations and fueling stations as are reserved under section 5." If the Filipinos insist upon full compliance with the Tydings Act, I recommend that no naval or fueling stations be retained, as such retention would likely involve us in further claims of protection or other international complications. My opinion is that the United States must either stay in the Philippines with full sovereignty or get out entirely.

4. An examination of the proposed constitution (a copy of which was shown me) clearly demonstrates that it is not in accord with the Tydings Act. I call attention to the following proposals in the constitution which are at war with the act or are so far out of harmony with it as to fail to follow its requirements:

(a) There is a provision in the Tydings Act that English shall be taught in the public schools. In one section of the constitution it is provided that English shall be taught only in the primary schools. In another section the constitution gives the legislature the right to choose one of the native dialects or languages. This provision shows a plain intention to disregard the requirements of the Tydings Act regarding the English language.

(b) The Tydings Act further provides that the property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States shall be acknowledged, respected, and safeguarded. The constitution provides that the legislature shall have the right to sequester large estates and divide them among Filipino citizens.

(c) The Tydings Act requires that the constitution shall provide for a government "republican in form." This expression has a distinct meaning, viz, that the new government shall be a republic patterned after the Government of the United States. The new constitution so provides. Since writing the above I understand this provision has been stricken out. The truth is that the Filipinos are not ready for a republic, and they know they can give themselves no kind of government other than a dictatorship; nor do I believe any other kind of government is intended or will be had.

5. The Filipinos desire a trade agreement by which they can sell their products in America free of tariff duty. They cannot have such an agreement until the 10 years have expired, because they are in no position to make a contract; but, without regard to the legal situation, the United States should not bind itself 10 years in advance of national independence as to what kind of trade agreement it will make with the Philippines. Such an agreement would not be fair to the sugar growers in continental United States; it would not be fair to the sugar growers in Hawaii or Puerto Rico; nor would it even be fair to the sugar growers in Cuba, whose position is similar to that of the Philippines. It would be unthinkable to make such an agreement 10 years before it is to go into effect. The Filipinos now have an excellent sugar quota, just as our own people have, and they are entitled to no better treatment than our own people.

6. I desire to warn our Filipino friends that they are making a great mistake in asking for complete national independence after a period of 10 years. I suggest to them that they petition the Congress to amend the Tydings Act by reserving to the United States sovereignty control of foreign affairs, Army, Navy, and air matters, tariff and immigration, leaving the power of review of the Supreme Court as it is now, and leaving to the United States the final determination as to issuing bonds and creating debts. They can well afford, and so can we, to leave the presidency as provided for under the new constitution, and to leave with the Philippine Government control over all other matters.

In view of the present condition of political and economic world affairs, this is the most inopportune time imaginable for the Filipinos to have granted to them complete national independence.

CONCLUSION

In closing, I desire to say that I have never been treated more hospitably, more courteously, or more kindly than I was by the Filipino people on the occasion of my recent visit to the islands. The Filipinos are naturally a kind and hospitable people. Their leaders are my friends, and some of them have long been so. I feel the greatest interest in them, in their country, and in their aspirations. I went to the islands earnestly desiring to help them in those aspirations to be a separate, free, and independent nation. After seeing the situation, however, after studying their problems, after talking to their leaders and their people, I am convinced that it is to their best interest at this time to become a completely self-governing local political entity, like one of our own States, but that it is wholly unwise and probably will be ruinous to them to separate themselves as an independent nation. Under the Tydings Act, of course, the matter has gone so far that it is now in their power to have national independence at the end of 10 years; but to persist in their present proposal, in my judgment, will result in bringing them nothing but economic disaster and ruin, and almost beyond a doubt political disaster as well. This course I cannot recommend.

The conclusions I have stated are those to which I am conclusively persuaded by the logic of the facts as I found them. I have discussed this subject solely from the standpoint of the Filipinos and what is best for them. I have scarcely referred to what is best for the United States. My best judgment is, however, that for the Philippines to separate from the United States and become an independent national entity would be hurtful to both peoples.

The attitude of the Filipinos in this matter is proof of the old saying that "almost anyone can stand adversity, but few can stand prosperity." Our Filipino friends have everything to make them free, independent, prosperous, and happy. Still, they are not satisfied. Apparently they are unable to stand the prosperity which is now theirs in so large and generous a measure, and which has been received at our hands.

FILIPINOS REVOLT; 65 REPORTED SLAIN IN FIERCE BATTLES—RADICALS REBEL IN PROVINCES AROUND MANILA—CUT OFF CAPITAL'S COMMUNICATIONS—SHARP FIGHT AT CUBUYAO—ACTING GOVERNOR HAYDEN IS URGED TO FLY BACK TO MANILA FROM NORTHERN AREA

[By the Associated Press]

MANILA, Friday, May 3.—At least 65 persons were reported slain in two battles growing out of bitter and wide-spread uprisings in the Provinces today against the projected new commonwealth governmental system. The suddenness and extent of the insurgent movement stunned high authorities.

Capt. José Guido, of the Constabulary Intelligence, reported to the Governor General's office that the situation was "very grave." He suggested that Acting Gov. Gen. Joseph R. Hayden dash back to Manila at once by airplane from Mountain Province, in northern Luzon, where he had been on an inspection tour.

SIXTY SLAIN IN ONE FIGHT

Two bloody battles were fought between constabulary detachments and extremists, called "Sakdalistas", in Laguna Province, south of here. The constabulary reported more than 60 dead as the result of the principal fight at Cabuyao, Laguna, but that the situation there was under control.

Previously five persons were reported slain in a clash between Sakdalistas and constabulary men at Santa Rosa, Laguna. One constabulary soldier was reported among the dead and three others were wounded.

A correspondent of the Spanish language newspaper La Vanguardia wired from Cabuyao that the extremists had barricaded themselves behind a wall of the town plaza for the night. Cabuyao is only a few miles from Santa Rosa.

Additional reports told of disorders in Cavite, Bulacan, and other Provinces adjacent to Manila.

MANILA CUT OFF FROM PROVINCES

Previously wire communications to and from the Provinces both north and south of the capital were severed. Constabulary men were sent to points where wires were reported cut.

Members of the Sakdal Party, asserted extremists with communistic leanings, are accused of plotting to assassinate Manuel Quezon, president of the insular senate and foremost candidate for the commonwealth presidency. Seven members of the party, allegedly involved in the assassination plot, are being prosecuted here on sedition charges.

[Gov. Gen. Frank Murphy, who is ill in White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., expressed regret that blood had been shed. "I am familiar with the Sakdal movement, which is radical but is being carried on by sincere people", he said.]

The Sakdalistas recently charged before Acting Gov. Gen. Joseph R. Hayden that they were being "threatened with prosecution for sedition" if they voted against ratification of the commonwealth constitution in the plebiscite to be held May 14.

Organized opposition to the commonwealth constitution has come thus far only from the Sakdalistas, a relatively small group. If the plebiscite results in popular ratification of the constitution, officials will set up a commonwealth government late this year.

It will serve the Philippines for the 10-year transitional period, after which the islands are destined to become a republic, independent of the United States.

WASHINGTON ASKS REPORT

WASHINGTON, May 2.—The War Department today telegraphed the Acting Governor General of the Philippines for a full report on the clashes between extremist groups and the Philippine Constabulary.

No direct report of the clashes had been received from any island officials.

Even before the seriousness of the situation in the Philippines had been described in press reports some Filipino quarters here viewed the fighting as an alarming indication of revolutionary conditions that might follow independence. PEDRO GUEVARA, Resident Commissioner for the Philippines, expressed outright alarm.

"It is my sincere conviction", he said in a statement after reading early newspaper reports of the Sakdalista uprising, "that such political riots, insignificant as they may be, may even jeopardize the life of the Philippine commonwealth.

"The event might be taken by the world as a hint as to what will happen in the Philippines once independence is an accomplished fact."

Resident Commissioner FRANCISCO DELGADO took a calmer view of the disturbance, saying:

"I think this is one of the things apt to happen in any country when passions are aroused as they are now on the eve of the plebiscite on a Philippine constitution. I believe it is the work of a few misguided racketeers taking advantage of the upset state of affairs to further communistic ends."

In congressional quarters reports of the uprising brought forth several expressions of opinions that the Filipinos are not ready for independence.

QUEZON, HERE, NOT ALARMED

Manuel Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate, who is in New York City, announced yesterday afternoon that all telephone and telegraph communication between Manila and the Philippine Provinces had been cut off at 8:30 p. m. yesterday (8:30 a. m. in New York) during an uprising of the Sakdalistas.

Señor Quezon, who is staying at the Hotel Warwick, 65 West Fifty-fourth Street, declared that there was some fighting in outlying towns but that the revolt had been quickly put under control by the government forces without severe losses. He explained that the Sakadalistas were led by Benigno Ramos, radical editor, who had left the country several months ago, and were composed, for the most part, of unemployed men.

He described Señor Ramos as " an irresponsible demagogue who at one time was in my employment in the senate and who was discharged from the service." Señor Quezon said he had been informed of the trouble over the long-distance telephone early yesterday morning.

" While no details could be given to me as yet of the scope or the extent of the movement, I am sure that the situation is well under control by the government and that there is no occasion for anxiety whatsoever ", he said.

" The Philippines, like many other countries, are suffering at present from the effect of the depression, and men out of work can easily be induced to do something drastic. The leader of the movement, Benigno Ramos, after inciting the masses, has left the islands, so that no action can be taken against him."

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, as a member of the special committee making the investigation of the Philippine Islands, I also have a report to submit, but I should prefer if possible to deliver the report at some convenient time in the near future. In view of the request of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to have his report printed as a Senate document, I request that the reports to be submitted by me may also be so printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMERICAN FOREIGN COMMERCIAL POLICY—ADDRESS BY SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, yesterday the Honorable Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, delivered a notable address before the Chamber of Commerce of the United States at its twenty-third annual meeting. In his address the Secretary of State very strongly stressed the importance and value of foreign trade and also the importance and necessity of lowering tariff rates. During the course of his address he said:

We have reached a point, however, when every country must go forward both on a domestic and international economic program, so that the buoyancy of an expanding world prosperity will develop to sustain and promote the expansion of domestic recovery. The international aspects of such a combined program are far broader than the mere readjustment of a limited number of tariff rates in this country. It envisages, broadly speaking, that important nations throughout the world will proceed gradually but simultaneously to readjust to a more reasonable level the existing excessive tariffs, quotas, and other trade barriers, and to abandon the chief forms of discrimination in international finance and commerce, and to adopt fair, equal, and friendly trade methods and practices.

Further in his address he said:

This country, of course, will not think of repeating its past experience of prescribing a one-way trading policy and then indulging in wild and reckless lending abroad. We need not, however, hide the fact that we made a far greater amount of equally reckless and worthless loans at home. The entire policy of careless and unsound lending at home and abroad alike should be reformed and placed on a sound and safe basis. Naturally, so long as the larger part of the world remains undeveloped and the overwhelming mass of the world population is suffering the pinch of economic distress, far-seeing business men in the capital producing countries will, as in the past, be found making investments and loans abroad.

I shall not quote further from the very interesting and timely address of the Secretary of State, but ask that, in its entirety, it may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FOREIGN COMMERCIAL POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, I am very happy to have been given this opportunity to speak to you about the effort which the administration is making to restore our foreign trade, for the condition of that trade and the state of our national well-being are intimately related. In time of acute depression measures of a purely national character are given paramount attention and considerations of foreign commercial policy tend for a time to become lost to view.

We have reached a point, however, when every country must go forward both on a domestic and international economic program, so that the buoyancy of an expanding world prosperity will develop to sustain and promote the expansion of domestic recovery. The international aspects of such a combined program are far broader than the mere readjustment of a limited number of tariff rates in this country. It envisages, broadly speaking, that important nations throughout the world will proceed gradually but simultaneously to readjust to a more reasonable level the existing excessive tariffs, quotas, and other trade barriers, and to abandon the chief forms of discrimination in international finance and commerce, and to adopt fair, equal, and friendly trade methods and practices.

While this and other countries have made a very considerable recovery in production and prices, and, under its constructive domestic program this country will make considerably more, the limitations encountered by reason of the extreme isolationism throughout the world are more and more pressing themselves upon the national consciousness of this and other countries. It is well, therefore, to give thought to the permanent and fundamental aspects of the situation in which our recovery policies as a whole must function. While it would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of domestic and internal measures for recovery, it is nevertheless true that the collapse of world trade is beyond any doubt one of the most important factors prolonging the depression. The break-down of the international structure has created uncertainty and fear, and holds in check the tens of billions of dollars of investment which today are most urgent owing to capital depreciation, obsolescence, renewals, repairs, and the need for new structures. What is required at this juncture is to move forward both on the domestic and the international fronts toward a full and stable measure of trade expansion and industrial prosperity.

May I here remark that on this day 2 years ago, in addressing the American section of the International Chamber of Commerce here in Washington, I strove to combat the isolationist tendency, and said:

" The opposing view, while disclaiming extreme economic internationalism, on the other hand would challenge extreme economic nationalism and launch this country upon a sane, practical middle course. It would supplement our impregnable home market with adequate foreign markets for our ever-increasing surpluses."

In the nineteenth century a closely coordinated world economy was developed based upon the very sound principle that man could conduct his affairs most profitably under conditions of reasonable freedom. It is indeed significant that this period, in which the great advantages of international commerce were generally recognized, witnessed the most rapid growth of population, the most amazing rise in the standard of living, and the broadest increase in the utilization of the earth's natural riches for mankind's benefit and happiness that has ever been experienced.

The industrial technic, together with its handmaidens, commerce and finance, was brought to a high degree of development first in England, from where it spread during the course of the nineteenth century to many other countries, including the United States. In this era we made immense gains in the production of both agricultural and industrial goods, thereby providing employment and a constantly rising standard of living for our rapidly increasing population. No small part of this advance was made possible by the steady expansion of world trade and the increasing demand of other countries for the goods we had to export. Being at that time a debtor and undeveloped country, a policy at times highly protective led to no serious consequences, but shortly after the World War, ignoring the economic transformation which had taken place, we began to erect barriers to our foreign trade not consistent with our newly achieved creditor position nor our efficiency in production. Within the short space of a decade we had raised our tariff rates on three successive occasions, thereby preparing the destruction of our vast foreign trade upon which a large share of our prosperity rested. This interference, opportunist in spirit, uncoordinated with our other policies, and contrary to our long-term interests, represented a definite break with the ideal of economic liberalism which had made possible this great commercial expansion.

The events of the World War enormously increased the importance of the United States commercially and financially in world affairs. Just at the time when the disturbed international relations of the post-war period called for the broadest possible development of world trade as a means of minimizing shocks and creating a new international balance, we adopted an unduly high protectionist policy which played its part in the subsequent world-wide collapse and contributed in so important a measure to the present break-down in international commercial and financial relations.

The time was when international relations were few and intermittent. The most widely different conditions could exist in different countries entirely unaffected by developments in other regions. Wars might even occur in parts of the world without the disturbance being felt appreciably elsewhere. The World War definitely demonstrated that this era had ended and that the expansion of transportation and communication combined with the growth of industry and commerce had created a world of closely connected states economically interrelated. Although many people in this country and abroad have refused to recognize this fundamental change, the universality of the depression has again furnished conclusive evidence of its actuality and completeness.

International relations are no longer incidental to national life but have become an essential factor in the existence of all nations.

When the war ended, many Americans of experience and vision saw the position of courageous economic leadership which the best interests of both this country and the rest of the war-sick world demanded of the United States. But the Nation as a whole allowed itself to be seized with an irrational fear of foreign competition. I believe that it was primarily that fear, and not pride or selfishness, that blinded us to the great advantages which we might have secured from an intelligent and sound development of our international economic relations.

This country, of course, will not think of repeating its past experience of prescribing a one-way trading policy and then indulging in wild and reckless lending abroad. We need not, however, hide the fact that we made a far greater amount of equally reckless and worthless loans at home. The entire policy of careless and unsound lending at home and abroad alike should be reformed and placed on a sound and safe basis. Naturally, so long as the larger part of the world remains undeveloped and the overwhelming mass of the world population is suffering the pinch of economic distress, far-seeing business men in the capital-producing countries will, as in the past, be found making investments and loans abroad.

Let us not fool ourselves as to the direction in which we are going. It is literally accurate to say that no nation was ever so well equipped to become a great trading nation, to play its role in assisting in the development of higher standards of living throughout the world and thereby stimulating the increased purchasing power of the huge populations in backward areas, which cannot fail to increase our own prosperity. With our superb natural resources, transportation facilities, productive equipment, and technique and power resources, we stand face to face in this year 1935 with the problem of whether we shall go forward with renewed industry, energy, hardihood, and the old pioneering spirit, or whether we shall falter and fall back, allowing second- and third-rate countries to step forward and take our place.

Extreme high-tariff barriers have been supplemented in many foreign countries by quantitative restrictions tantamount frequently to embargoes and by the control of foreign exchange which is often allotted on a most arbitrary basis. To these a number of other less important but scarcely less burdensome and irritating restrictions have been added, all designed to exclude imports and all having the effect of choking and throttling world trade. As a result, on the one hand, surpluses of many kinds of both agricultural and industrial goods have accumulated in the countries which formerly supplied these products to the world, while on the other hand these very goods are being produced uneconomically and consequently at exorbitant prices in the former consumer countries behind their unscalable barriers. Sorry substitutes, absurd synthetic production, and inferior quality production, virtually worthless, are being attempted.

The international price structure for some time has been dislocated. For many commodities there is no longer any such thing as a world price. In many instances prices are 2, 3, or 4 times higher in one country than in the surplus-producing countries. This is true of wheat, lard, and other commodities highly important for our domestic producers and for consuming masses of foreign populations.

The resources of the world needed for modern ways of living and for the development of a higher future civilization are not evenly distributed throughout the globe. Basic raw materials of modern industrialism are highly concentrated in certain countries, notably the United States and western Europe. Even our own great country, with its natural resources of iron ore, coal, petroleum, lead, zinc, copper, and other mineral resources, is deficient of many basic materials which are drawn from all parts of the world, including wood pulp, tin, nickel, manganese ore, rubber, raw silk, jute, hemp, flax and other fibers, hides and skins, and of foods such as sugar, coffee, tea, spices, and certain fruits not obtainable at home. The modern industrial structure depends upon the interchange of products localized in certain areas and which the various countries of the world can enjoy only on the basis of international trade.

One has only to look at the figures of the proportion of domestic production exported by the countries of Central and South America and the Orient to see how highly dependent these areas are upon world trade. No one who has not particularly concerned himself with these problems can realize the degree to which various countries have developed specialties of their own. We in this country have developed such specialties, notably in cotton, lard, tobacco, automobiles, machinery, copper and petroleum products, fruits, electrical and office appliances, as well as a host of products of smaller value, and these specialties bulk large in our trade with almost every country. Similarly every other country has specialties with which it reaches out in its contacts with the four corners of the globe.

Whenever this interchange of products, to the extent mutually profitable, is obstructed, the prices of the products that are destined for the world market are seriously depressed. The ensuing economic distress leads to political unrest and sometime to revolution. The disturbed conditions of the last 6 years incident to the disruption of the world economic system have been chiefly responsible for the political upheavals and the downfall of government after government in almost all parts of the world. Internal distress opens the way for the demagogue and the agitator, stirs up internal class strife, and especially develops international friction, fear, and resentment of foreign peoples and governments, and shatters the very foundations of world peace. The dangerous political situations that exist throughout the world today, the international tension, the recrudescence of the military spirit, the expansion of standing armies, the enormously increased military budgets, the feverish efforts made to invent new instruments of warfare, new weapons for offense and defense—all these have emerged and developed in a world in which the international economic structure has been shattered, in which normal peaceful commercial intercourse has been broken and vast unemployment and human distress has resulted. It is the collapse of the world structure, the development of isolated economies, that has let loose the fear which now grips every nation and which threatens the peace of the world. We cannot have a peaceful world, we cannot have a prosperous world, until we rebuild the international economic structure.

Economic questions and conditions form the basis of international relations now more than at any other time in history. If nations are engaged in discrimination or retaliation or in the practice of irritating trade methods toward one another, the preservation of friendly relations and of that understanding necessary for peace and mutual prosperity is rendered difficult and precarious. Without friendly relations and understanding nations are little prone to settle questions or controversies by arbitration or other orderly and peaceful means. On the contrary, they are hasty to arm and to institute force for justice in international affairs. We behold that tendency progressed to an alarming extent today.

The desire of the Government to combat this trend, which it is convinced can lead only to the serious deterioration of our civilization, is the controlling reason for the efforts which it is now making to restore international trade on a basis of equality and friendship. This must continue to be the basis for world commercial relations.

The numerous discriminations now practiced by nations in their manipulation of tariff rates, quotas, exchange controls, and other devices designed to exclude foreign products, and in their exclusive bilateral arrangements, have undoubtedly been one of the chief causes which have led to the serious economic and political conditions now prevailing. Not only are nations rapidly impoverishing themselves by these practices, but they are thereby also inviting the enmity and provoking the resentment of other peoples. The irony of bilateral arrangements to the exclusion of triangular and multilateral trade lies in the fact that, while their advantages are soon overcome by the counteractive measures adopted by the states against which they discriminate, the feelings of dislike and distrust which they engender live on.

I am not altogether surprised when people uninstructed in the conduct of international relations and commercial policies and concerned solely with their immediate selfish interests criticize the Government for refusing to adopt this course, for doubtless they can see in it only the temporary advantages which it promises to themselves and not the harm that it inevitably causes the Nation as a whole.

The tendency to seek special preferences abroad is coupled with the stubborn and frequently unscrupulous resistance encountered by the Government when even the most moderate reduction in a tariff rate is proposed regardless of how clearly this may be to the advantage of the country as a whole. The pressure which is being currently brought upon both legislators and officials in Washington by those who fear that they are to be deprived of even a small part of the artificial advantage given them by an overindulgent Government too often at the expense of efficient producers and consumers in general, would incline one to believe that much of the sturdy self-reliance, hardihood, and vigor of this country are definitely on the decline. Every post which comes to the Department of State brings letters requesting, and frequently demanding, that the Government obtain for their writers some personal or local advantage, often in clear defiance of the general interest. As I suppose is only to be expected, these demands are frequently absurdly conflicting.

The Government is asked, on the one hand, to reduce, or more often to prevent entirely, the importation of this or that article or class of goods and, on the other, to secure preferences in foreign markets for this or that American product. I have had presented to me time and again schemes for expanding our exports of our agricultural products by means of preferential arrangements, dumping devices, and other measures which involve serious complications of our general trade relations. These same people insist on complete embargoes against industrial and agricultural imports. These people have not yet learned the lesson, which now ought to be evident to everyone, that foreign countries cannot continue to buy our cotton, lard, tobacco, and other surplus commodities unless the exchange with which to pay for these products is made available through imports into the United States. We cannot continue to sell even our most important products abroad unless we are disposed to buy to the extent mutually profitable. I wish to call your attention particularly to the decline in this current year of our exports to many of our best consuming markets in Europe. Thus our exports to Europe in January and February of this year declined 16 percent in relation to that of January and February of a year ago. If we place embargoes upon our imports, we shall, in the last analysis, witness inevitably the destruction of our export trade. Seized with an unreasoning fear whenever a small driblet of imports of a competitive nature comes over our tariff wall, even when under purely temporary or accidental conditions, such as, for example, the drought, action is urged which, if allowed too frequently, may lead to retaliation by other countries, so that step by step such actions lead straight toward a complete embargo of imports all around, and, since one country's imports is another country's exports, a like embargo of exports all around.

We oppose exclusive or preferential arrangements the effect of which would be to impose discriminatory tariff rates against other countries. On the other side this country does not intend to accept discrimination against American commerce in foreign countries. It desires to extend equality of treatment to all nations and it seeks to obtain fair and equitable treatment from all nations. The unconditional most-favored-nation policy, as already indicated, is the one which almost universal experience since the middle of the last century has demonstrated to be the best suited for the attainment of these purposes. This Government is convinced that only if it makes the most determined attempt to stem the degeneration of international commercial intercourse into a network of bilateral arrangements of an exclusive and restrictive type with their accompanying discriminations and retaliations can international trade be restored.

It is my belief that most nations drifted into the condition in which they now find themselves, due primarily to the pressure of the peculiar maladjustments of the post-war period and the wave of extreme economic nationalism incident thereto; that, with possibly a few exceptions, they have not deliberately elected to follow the course to which circumstances have forced them. It is incumbent upon some great nation, certainly the United States as much as any other, to come forward with a broad, constructive program calculated to displace gradually the policies which have proven so futile and so destructive during these past several years. With the sources of information that the organization of the Government places at my disposal I see not a few evidences of the state of mind of other peoples which give me reason to believe that the program which this administration is following is beginning to supply the inspiration necessary to induce them to alter their course and to hope that the world can shortly expect a general movement in the direction of international economic sanity.

There are those who believe that international trade cannot exist in modern times without endangering and destroying the industries of each separate country. These people believe, too, that all international commerce is highly competitive and therefore destructive to industries of the various nations. On the contrary, in the very nature of the case, international trade as contemplated in our program is, broadly speaking, complementary in character. The history of our own foreign trade, and the shifts that have occurred in the structure of our imports and exports illustrate the complementary character of foreign trade. One hundred years ago two-thirds of our exports consisted of raw materials, and more than half of our imports consisted of finished manufactures Today half of our exports consist of finished manufactures and nearly half of our imports are raw materials. These enormous shifts in the structure of our imports and exports indicate in part the adjustment of foreign trade to the needs of our national economy, though in part the present structure of our trade has been shaped by artificial restrictions. While our imports of finished manufactures constitute a smaller proportion of our imports now than formerly, it is important to note that the absolute value of these imports increased from $100,000,000 in 1850 to $1,000,000,000 in 1929. Of the finished manufactures, the greater part consist of specialty products which are not directly or seriously competitive with products of our own industries. Essentially, they complement our own products. With the progress of invention and the development of an increasing number of finished goods which go with higher standards of living, in contrast to the simpler products needed in a more primitive society, we may anticipate a constantly larger interchange of finished products.

Foreign trade, to be complementary and noncompetitive, is not necessarily confined to the exchange of raw materials and foodstuffs for finished manufactured goods. The new products that have emerged in the last few decades illustrate the enormous impetus which invention and discovery may give to foreign trade. One has only to mention in this connection the importance of many of these newer products such as motor cars, radio sets, office equipment, electrical appliances, etc., in our own foreign trade. With rising standards of living incident to the industrial development of the economically backward countries, the increased purchasing power will inevitably give rise to a larger consumption of our mass production goods in exchange for specialty products. Each dollar of such imports, of course, pays for a dollar's worth of our burdensome surplus exported.

I repeat, international trade has always been essentially of a complementary character, rather than sharply competitive, and this will continue to be the case. If we give proper encouragement, by minimizing the obstacles to trade, to the development and expansion of those industries in which each country, by reason of natural resources, soil, climate, mechanical equipment, horsepower, and special aptitudes of skill and training, is most efficient, there will continue to be an expanding scope for international trade based on complementary relations rather than on sharp competition. Indeed, the more we encourage our efficient industries to find foreign markets, the more the structure of our industry will be shifted toward those lines where it will not feel the impact of foreign competition. It is the country that seeks to protect unnatural industries which is always faced with foreign competition. And, on the contrary, it is the country that efficiently and courageously develops its natural strength and natural industries which is least subject to foreign competition. It is not our automobile industry, for example, which complains about foreign competition. It is our highly protected industries which complain.

The trade-agreements program, first promulgated and unanimously adopted by the 21 American nations at Montevideo and now actively being carried forward by this Government, is based upon the view that international trade among other things is a material factor in the full and stable business recovery of individual nations; that unreasonable trade barriers can only be effectively reduced by a constructive program carried out over a period of years concurrently by the leading nations of the world; that such liberalized commercial policy will be a vital factor in the reduction of unemployment, the increase in domestic prices, and the improvement of business conditions throughout the world. What we propose in a fair and friendly way as stated affords the best possible foundations on which to rebuild sound and worthwhile international relations. This program contemplates a simultaneous and continuous attack by all wide-awake nations upon the several well-recognized obstructions to the restoration of international trade and finance.

The opponents of a liberal commercial policy would have every nation by means of a purely nationalistic program alone attempt to restore domestic prosperity, while at the same time intensifying the existing network of trade-destroying restrictions and practices. The proponents of a liberal commercial policy, on the other hand, would utilize the most comprehensive domestic and international programs combined and would cut through these trade restrictions and open the way toward an expansion of world trade as an aid to domestic recovery, thereby combining domestic measures with international measures designed to rehabilitate a full measure of domestic and world prosperity.

This country can and must furnish its fair share of leadership in this great movement. For this it is peculiarly fitted because of its weight and importance in the world economy, and because it is less tied up in the entanglements and restrictive policies in which other countries, frequently against their will, have become enmeshed. The way lies open for new opportunities in world leadership toward peace and prosperity.

PAYMENT OF SOLDIERS' ADJUSTED COMPENSATION

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, on Armistice Day, 1922, the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] delivered a very informative and interesting address on the subject of the soldiers' bonus. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is the fourth anniversary of a memorable day in human history. November 11, 1918, signalized not alone the ending of the greatest war in the annals of mankind but it marked the beginning of a new era in civilization.

The European war had its origin in causes which were distinctly alien to American ideals and traditions. Conflicting national interests and ambitions, secret alliances and counter alliances which sought to gain political, economic, and military advantages to those concerned, racial and national hatreds engendered by centuries of strife, resulted in a final death grapple between two opposing principles of government, autocracy on the one hand and democracy on the other. For generations all Europe had been an armed camp. England, the greatest military power on the high seas, Germany, the greatest military power on land, and France, Italy, Belgium, Russia, Austria, Turkey, and the Balkan States, all armed to the death, awaited only the explosive to set in motion the mightiest machine for human slaughter ever operated in the history of mankind. The explosion came in August 1914 and the world was thrown into a colossal convulsion from which it has now only partially emerged.

ISOLATION COULD NOT KEEP AMERICA OUT OF WORLD WAR

America had nothing to do with the controversies or causes which lead up to this great disaster. By tradition and by consistent policy we had never been a military power. We had never maintained a large standing army, but with the growth of powerful foreign navies, and because of our extended coast line, we had gradually built up a formidable modern navy of our own. But its primary purpose was self-defense and not aggression. We believed that our remoteness from the fields of foreign wars rendered us immune from embroilment or attack. But we had not taken into consideration the fact that our growth as a nation had necessarily made us a powerful factor in world commerce and that our security and prosperity were dependent upon the maintenance of our rights upon the high seas and upon uninterrupted intercourse with all parts of the world. When the European clash came, we declared our neutrality and sought by every peaceful means to maintain it. But the most powerful of the European belligerents began to encroach upon our neutral rights whenever they found that it was to their advantage to do so. We quickly discovered that it was impossible to isolate America. She was an integral part of world economy, her products were in demand by all the nations, she had a right as a neutral to trade with them and she refused to yield any of her vital rights to escape collision with any challenger or upon the behest of any despot. She was one of the most important members of the family of nations and she could neither shirk her responsibilities nor avoid the consequences. Disregard of America's rights by all of the belligerents produced a continuing tension which finally culminated in the destruction by one of the great powers of the lives and property of American citizens on the high seas in violation of the accepted rules of international warfare, and no alternative was left except to draw the sword.

AMERICA'S ACTION AN INSPIRING SPECTACLE

On April 6, 1917, Congress passed the fateful resolution that threw America into the World War and made her a party belligerent in the greatest conflict of all time on a field of action more than 3,000 miles from the Atlantic seaboard. With characteristic patriotism and energy the Nation sprang to arms. One of the most inspiring spectacles of all history was presented when the most powerful and peaceful democracy of all the ages transformed itself, with incredible celerity and efficiency, into an irresistible military machine. The young David of democracy was matched in mortal combat with the mailed Goliath of autocracy. Democracy won the battle and we today celebrate the victory.

ARE WE UNEQUAL TO OUR IDEALS?

But have we realized the thing for which we fought primarily, the thing which lit the crusaders' fire in the hearts of our people, the thing which has been the Christian dream of centuries, the thing without which civilization is still imperiled, the thing which, above all things, would bring the greatest blessings to the human race—the destruction of war itself and the enthronement of enduring peace? We have not. America failed to follow up the victory. The greatest tragedy of human hopes was written when she refused to march onward to the goal which, for the first time since Christ, seemed almost within the Christian grasp. The 4,000,000 men who sprang to the defense of their country with the determination to end war for all time, found themselves cheated of their prey in the very hour of their victory. Mars, the repulsive god of war, escaped, and again sits omnipotent upon his throne, ready to hurl new disasters upon the world. The peace of the world was destroyed by partisan politics. Selfishness and intolerance regained the day. We seek an isolation we cannot find, and we suffer the consequences, moral, spiritual, and economic, of our failure to live up to our responsibilities and maintain the noble ideals which made us unconquerable on the field of battle.

In this reversion from the sublime heights of Christian purpose and glorious achievement to the debased level of partisan politics and ignoble shirking, our sense of justice and gratitude to the 4,000,000 men who fought the war and won the victory seems to have been destroyed. We have failed them. We have, thus far, proven ourselves unequal to the ideals for which they fought and incapable of appreciating the heroic services they rendered in the hour of national peril.

ALLIES WERE FACING DEFEAT

What was the situation in the spring of 1917 when America entered the war? A gloomier outlook for the Allied cause could not be painted. The submarine was doing its deadly work at sea, rapidly destroying the means of communication between Great Britain, France, Italy, and the United States, upon the maintenance of which depended their supplies of food, munitions, and war materials. The ghastly prospect of starvation stared the Allies in the face. Quick relief could be obtained only from America. But the credit of the Allies was exhausted. This was a graver danger than the immediate effects of the submarine because without money or credit they could not buy essential supplies in America. At that time Great Britain had demand obligations in American banks amounting to $400,000,000 which she could not meet. France and Italy were in financial extremity. What the Allies needed immediately to save them from irretrievable disaster was, first, American money, and second, American men.

By act of Congress the Secretary of the Treasury was armed with authority to meet the credit situation. The Treasury of the United States immediately extended first aid to Great Britain, France, and Italy by lending them money to buy the food and munitions necessary to keep them on their fighting line until American men could arrive upon the field of battle.

THE DOUGHBOY WON THE VICTORY

American men quickly followed American money—and what a colossal task it was to prepare untrained young America to fight the veteran legions of the most powerful military nations of the earth! But this was not all: To transport them across 3,000 miles of sea infested with treacherous submarines and to put them in the battle line on foreign soil in strange surroundings amid a jargon of foreign tongues equipped to fight the experienced veterans of the enemy, seemed an impossible task. But in an incredibly short space of time our raw recruits were transformed into a militant and irresistible fighting force. Three thousand miles of ocean were annihilated. The submarine was overcome. The mighty legions of the trained enemy were met and conquered, and in 18 months after America entered the war, victory had been torn from the hands of defeat, and the American doughboy was acclaimed as the protector of the Nation and savior of liberty and democracy in the world. For these heroic achievements, and in the flush of victory, the lips of a grateful people, in a grand chorus of praise and gratitude, said that nothing was too good for him.

How was this mighty deed accomplished? By the organized might of America! The crisis was so grave that we could not rely upon our traditional policy of waiting for the volunteer to come forward and undertake this perilous and prodigious task. Swift measures were imperative. The Congress had provided the necessary money and credit to sustain the allied cause until American troops could take the field, and now Congress took the next great step and passed a law, establishing a fundamental principle of war-making in a democracy—a universal draft law—that required every eligible young man, the sons of the rich and the sons of the poor alike, to go into training and fight without discrimination or favoritism for the cause of their country.

Under this law the strong arm of Uncle Sam stretched out into every home in the land where there was an eligible boy of military age, and took him, without the sanction and regardless of the feelings of parents and loved ones, before selective service boards which chose those who were physically fit and sent them into training camps throughout the country. Four millions of America's finest young effectives were taken in this manner and molded into an unconquerable fighting force.

OUR SOLDIERS DRAFTED, NOT CONSULTED

We did not ask these young men if they wanted to go into the trenches and give their lives for their country. We did not, nor could we in time of national peril, consult their wishes in the matter. We took them and sent them out to perform the supreme duty of patriotism. The life of the Nation was at stake and it was they who had to save it. We did not ask these men what compensation would be acceptable for the hazardous work we thrust upon them. There was neither individual nor collective bargaining as, of course, there could not be. The Congress arbitrarily fixed their pay and said that a soldier should receive, while fighting on the bloody fields of France, the sum of $1.10 per day, and while in reserve on American soil, awaiting the call to Europe, $1 per day. In the judgment of Congress it was worth 10 cents more per day to face the enemy's shot and shell and poison gas on the battlefields of Europe, than to be in reserve in America. Of this meager compensation the soldier paid almost one-fourth for the life insurance which a grateful Nation permitted him to buy at minimum rates. If he was a married man, he was required by law to pay in addition, another half of his compensation for the support of his dependent family. The little that was left (about $10 per month) the soldier was permitted to dispose of as he saw fit. There was, of course, no chance for the men and women in the Army and Navy to effect savings. After payments for life insurance and allowance for the support of families and loved ones, barely enough was left for their ordinary needs.

The war was ended, and, by their valor, ended a year sooner than expected.

The victorious heroes returned. With justified pride and deep emotion they trod again the soil of their native land amid the plaudits of the multitude. Then they were mustered out. Their swords were sheathed, their guns stacked, their uniforms laid aside, and the undramatic and crowded fields of civil life stretched before them. These young heroes had come from the farms, the villages, the towns, and the cities of every part of the land. They had given up their jobs and occupations. They had exchanged their environments for something new, something different, something uplifting. Their horizons had been widened. They had fought for great ideals and for noble objects. They had been reforged in a crucible of fire and remade in the grim school of discipline and danger. They were bigger men—they were broader men than the unsophisticated youths who entered the Army as raw recruits from the farms, the plains, the mountains, and the cities of a great Nation. They had to start life anew with enlarged vision, with new and finer conceptions of duty, with higher aims and ambitions. Thousands of them could not look with patience upon the narrow and provincial life from which they had been drawn. They wanted larger opportunity to make themselves useful citizens of the greatest Republic of all time. They wanted a chance at a larger and more fruitful life.

RETURNING VETERANS DISILLUSIONED

But what was there to begin with except character, enlarged experience and bright hope? They had emerged from the warm atmosphere of national welcome to find themselves in the cold atmosphere of practical, unsympathetic, indifferent civil life. Where were the jobs they had been led to believe were awaiting with warm welcome their return? Where were the opportunities which they had been told that a grateful Nation would shower upon them for their heroic services—for their priceless contribution to the cause of liberty and democracy? They were gone. Jobs and opportunity had been conquered by those who stayed at home and faced no peril while the conquerors of the Nation's foe were engaged on the field of battle. Life stretched before them, but what was there to start with? Not even a paltry fund which, if promptly available, would have opened up to the returned soldier the opportunity for a new and prosperous career.

It was the very need of this assistance, resulting from the inadequate pay granted the soldiers, that prompted the suggestion that a grateful nation recognize their inestimable services by increasing the compensation paid to them during the war. This is familiarly known as "adjusted compensation" or "soldiers' bonus", and since it has been under consideration for the past 4 years and is an important public question, it does not seem inappropriate to discuss it on this occasion.

BONUS IS JUSTICE

What is "adjusted compensation" or "soldiers' bonus"?

It is a proposal that the men who fought in France and received but $1.10 per day therefor be paid an additional $1.25 per day for the period of actual service and that the men who were held in reserve in camps in the United States and received but $1 per day therefor be paid an additional $1 per day for the period of actual service; but that in no case should the soldier in foreign service receive a total additional payment of more than $600 nor the soldier in home service a total of more than $500.

Is this an unreasonable request? Is $2.35 per day, or $70.50 per month, too much to pay to the men who endured all the dangers and horrors and sufferings of the trenches and of bloody battles? Is $2 per day too much to pay to the men who were kept in reserve, awaiting orders to go to the front and fill the gaps caused by those who died in battle?

As adequate compensation for service performed, it is, of course, too little; but as evidence of gratitude and appreciation of a great duty nobly performed, it is something. As a genuine help to the four million men and women who saved the Nation from grave peril it is much. As a matter of justice, it is everything.

GOVERNMENT CIVIL EMPLOYEES RECOGNIZED

While these men were fighting and sacrificing for country every class in America, protected by their valor and sacrifice, was living in safety and earning more money and making larger profits than ever before in our history. Even the civil employees of the Government, more than 500,000 in number, who were receiving salaries of $2,500 or less per annum were granted a bonus of $240 per year. For the past 5 years these civil employees have already received a total bonus of $1,200 each—twice the maximum proposed for the soldiers, and the bonus is still continuing.

The great manufacturing interests, which produced war munitions and supplies, and the great trusts and combinations in control of vital necessities for the Army and the Navy, and the people, made fabulous profits during the war because the valor of our heroes in the field made them secure in life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of profit. By contrast, how can this great Nation fail to grant the claim of the men, who saved the Nation from disaster, to the comparatively small recognition involved in the allowance of their request for a readjustment of compensation for the actual time they were in the service of their country?

A committee of the Senate, after exhaustive investigation, reported that it would require only about $1,600,000,000 to pay in cash the entire amount of the adjusted compensation or bonus to the enlisted men and women of the United States.

But immediately a cry arose from the very interests which had profited most by the valor of the soldiers, that to pay the adjusted compensation would impose a greater burden upon the American people than they could bear, and that the credit of the Government would be destroyed if such payment should be undertaken.

Never was there a more fallacious and unsupportable claim, and never was there an exhibition of baser ingratitude.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION NOT A BURDEN

The Nation could have paid the claims for adjusted compensation without hurt to the national credit, and without imposing serious burdens upon the people. The additional compensation should be treated as a part of the cost of the war and should, like other burdens of the war, be funded into long-time obligations and the payment spread over several generations so that the present generation should not be required to pay an undue share of it and succeeding generations should be required to pay a just share of it. We could issue 50-year Government bonds in sufficient amount to pay the bonus in cash and thus not only discharge creditably and promptly an obligation the country justly owes, but remove the question from the hands of partisan and tricky politicians who have made use of the issue for base and ignoble ends. By this method another desirable result is accomplished—additional onerous burdens would not be imposed on the present generation which is already staggering under a heavy load of taxation. Only the annual interest and sinking fund would have to be paid. This would not exceed a total of 5 percent, or about $80,000,000 per annum, to take care of the interest on the bonds and the payment of the principal at maturity.

A HUGE TARIFF SUBSIDY GRANTED TO GREED

It is sheer hypocrisy to say that the Nation cannot bear this relatively insignificant burden when great subsidies are granted to private interests at the expense of the people and for purposes which cannot be successfully defended. The Fordney-McCumber tariff bill was recently passed by Congress and approved by the President. It is estimated that the trusts, monopolies, combinations in restraint of trade and other beneficiaries of this measure, will be able to take from the people billions of dollars through indirect taxation by tariff-protected monopolies. How can this indefensible exploitation of the masses be justified when the soldiers and sailors who saved our institutions are denied a just recognition of $1,600,000,000 on the ground that to grant it would impose excessive burdens on the American people? Ten billion, eight hundred million dollars for trusts and monopolies, and not one cent for the heroic defenders of their country!

WHY NOT TARIFF BENEFICIARIES PAY THE BONUS?

But if the frank and direct method of issuing Government bonds for the payment of adjusted compensation in cash should not be adopted, why should not the beneficiaries of the tariff bill be required to divide their subsidy with the Nation's defenders? In this way adjusted compensation could be paid without imposing new burdens upon the American people; in this way those who received the greatest material benefit from the valor of our soldiers will be required to share with them the undue profits and advantages which a complacent Congress has so generously conferred upon them. How can it be done? Let an average of the net earnings of every trust, monopoly, corporation, or beneficiary of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill be ascertained for 5 years, or for some reasonable period preceding the enactment of that law. Then take each year 50 percent of all net earnings of these tariff beneficiaries in excess of this average, while the Fordney-McCumber bill is in effect, and apply it to the payment of the soldiers' bonus.

It would be peculiarly appropriate to make these tariff beneficiaries divide with the men and women who went to France when the black clouds of disaster overhung civilization and American liberty and dispelled them with the sunshine of their heroism and sacrifice.

This is not an impracticable ideal. It can be formulated into a law that can be administered. The plan is analogous to that adopted by the British Government for raising revenue to carry on the war. An average of the net earnings of all forms of business in Great Britain was ascertained for a period preceding the outbreak of the war and all profits in excess of that average were treated as war profits and taxed 80 percent. By this practical and simple plan the British Government repressed the war profiteer and forced those who profited by the war to contribute 80 percent of those profits to the national defense fund instead of permitting excessive profits arising from abnormal conditions created by the war, to be retained for private ends.

NO EXCUSE FOR INJUSTICE OR INGRATITUDE

There are those who say that our enlisted men and women should not be paid additional compensation because they will waste the money—that no benefits will therefore be conferred upon them. This is, of course, mere assertion based neither upon fact nor reason. Arguing from human experience and natural tendency of most men and women to save money and not to waste it, to use it wisely and not to lose it, it is more reasonable to assume that the great majority will use the money beneficially. But assuming for the sake of argument that justice demands that the claims of the soldiers be paid, or that the gratitude of a saved Nation prompts the payment, it is no answer to say that justice should be denied or gratitude stifled upon the mere assumption that those entitled to justice or those who should be the recipients of the Nation's gratitude may not use the rewards wisely or beneficially. We cannot satisfy the demands of justice by being unjust nor manifest gratitude by refusing to be grateful. If the soldiers are entitled to the bonus either because justice demands it or gratitude prompts it, it should be paid to them no matter what they may do with it. In its final analysis it is an affront to the enlisted men and women to assume that they are so worthless and incompetent that they will not make proper use of a payment to which they are, in justice, entitled.

NOT COMMERCIALIZING PATRIOTISM

There are others who say that the bonus should not be paid because it will "commercialize patriotism." This is merely trying to satisfy conscience with a phrase. If it be commercializing patriotism to increase the pay of the soldier for the dangerous work he did in the war, then why was it not equally commercializing patriotism to pay him anything whatever for serving in the war? The argument must be carried to its logical conclusion. Either he should be paid within reasonable limits to the full extent of the Nation's ability to pay, or he should not be paid at all. If patriotism is to be exacted of the soldier without cost, then in time of war all civilian effort should be drafted without cost, and no profit should be allowed to private enterprise or service as a contribution to the war effort. The most unfair and unjust thing that the opponents of the soldiers' bonus have done to the 4,000,000 gallant men and women who fought the war is this attempt to impeach their patriotism. A greater wrong could not be done. If it would commercialize patriotism to increase the pay of the soldier for the service he rendered in the war, then what can be said of the gross commercializing of patriotism indulged in by every firm, corporation, and individual who turned to the utmost profit the opportunities the war gave them?

It is not unnatural that the people should hesitate to assume new tax burdens at a time when they already are overloaded with State, local, and national taxation. Certainly these burdens ought not to be increased without convincing reasons. The opposition to the soldiers' bonus is grounded largely upon the fear that it will inevitably impose new tax burdens. But this objection is met if the bonus can be paid without increasing existing burdens through a division of the tariff subsidies already imposed upon the people or through the issuance of long-time Government bonds which will distribute the burden lightly over several generations. But in no circumstances can any nation take the position that justice to any great class of its citizens shall be denied because it will cost something to do justice.

JUSTICE, LIBERTY, DEMOCRACY NOT TO BE MEASURED IN DOLLARS

There are some things which cannot be measured in dollars. Justice is one of them. Liberty is another. Democracy is still another. Liberty and democracy are founded upon justice, and the Nation must stand for justice and do justice no matter what the cost may be in blood or treasure. If we refuse to do justice to the great army of men and women who saved the Nation in its hour of extremity; if we leave in the hearts of the 4,000,000 defenders of the Nation and in the hearts of their families and friends the feeling that the Nation is not only unjust, but ungrateful, may we not do a graver injury to the spirit and morale and patriotism of our people than any savings in taxation could ever compensate?

In the wave of materialism which has swept over the land since the war was fought, our higher ideals seem to have been obscured. What Armistice Day ought to celebrate instead of merely signify has not yet been secured. Perhaps these things are only in eclipse. The triumph over war, injustice, and oppression has not yet come. It may never come in full perfection, but it is our duty to fight unfalteringly for this noble end.

Let us pray God that that day of triumph may come, and while we pray God and press on with unconquerable determination, let us make sure that we preserve the soul of the Nation from the corroding influences of injustice, materialism, and selfishness. Let us, on this day made glorious by the valorous deeds of our sons and daughters, resolve that this great Nation, fashioned by our forefathers in the spirit of the Christian God and dedicated by them to the service of humanity, shall be preserved for all time.

TREASURY AND POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I rise to inquire about House bill 4442, being the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill. It will be remembered that the bill passed the Senate April 1. It contained a proviso that certain employees of the Alcohol Tax Unit in the Treasury Department should be required to take an examination before May 15. The employees affected are ready, willing, and anxious to take the examination. The bill has been in conference since April 1. Of course, if the bill should be delayed much longer it would be a hollow mockery to say that these employees should take an examination by May 15, when May 15 may arrive before the conference report shall be adopted.

Can any Senator give me assurance as to when the conference report on the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill may be agreed to?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I concur in what is said by the Senator from Arizona, and appeal to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], who can possibly tell us what has become of the conference report?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is chairman of the Senate conferees, and I do not see him in the Chamber at the moment. I think there is some question about an appropriation relating to ocean-mail matters which has delayed the report, but I have no idea that the bill will be unduly delayed in any way.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I assert my conviction that there is no sinister move looking toward delaying the conference report; but I repeat that by the amendment referred to it was provided that these clerks, some thousand in number, should take an examination before May 15. I am sure the Senate does not want to occupy the attitude of requiring some thousand Government employees to take an examination by May 15 when it is doubtful if the bill will become a law by that date.

I call attention, respectfully, of course, to the fact that the House concurred in the conference report, according to the RECORD, on April 22. I do not doubt the correctness of the statement of my esteemed friend from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] in his observation that some appropriation regarding ocean mail is delaying the conference report. I conclude by expressing the hope that the conference report may be adopted at a very early date.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3896) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, for controlled expansion of the currency, and to extend the time for filing applications for benefits under the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. This is a matter of more or less importance, of more importance to some, perhaps, than to others. I think all Senators want to have a chance to vote on the various proposals. Some Senators are absent in the belief, evidently, that no vote would come today. Today is Friday. Some Senators are out of town and others are preparing to leave for the week-end.

I suggest the advisability of agreeing to a time definite when we may vote on the substitute of the Senator from Missouri. If we can come to some agreement, commencing Monday, say, at 1 o'clock, with a reasonable limitation of debate, we can come to a vote, I am sure, with regard to the substitute of the Senator from Missouri within a very reasonable time. That would put each Senator on notice, and he could either be paired or could be present. I suggest such an arrangement to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit the following unanimous-consent request:

That beginning on Monday at 1 o'clock, debate on the pending amendment and all other amendments shall be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the Senator goes further, I will say that it is hardly necessary for him to consume the time, because there will be objection to any 10-minute limitation of debate.

Mr. CLARK. After 1 o'clock Monday.

Mr. HARRISON. I said, after 1 o'clock Monday.

Mr. SMITH. I understood the Senator from Oklahoma to say that he would like to have us postpone any debate on this matter until Monday. The likelihood is that we shall recess from today until Monday. I wish to have it now understood that this is a measure which involves more than the bonus, and some of us desire to have something to say about the principle involved in other matters which pertain directly to the primary purpose of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from South Carolina that I was only trying to accommodate the Senate. I am perfectly willing to vote now upon the pending amendment, and proceed in an orderly way through tomorrow. That is perfectly agreeable to me; but it has been suggested by several Senators that if we could reach an agreement to limit debate to 10 minutes on amendments and 10 minutes on the bill beginning at 1 o'clock on Monday, it might be satisfactory. If it is not satisfactory, that is perfectly all right, and we can proceed today and tomorrow with the discussion on the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, from the inquiry I have made I feel certain that such a proposal would not meet the unanimous consent of the Members of the Senate. Let me suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that, after 1 o'clock on Monday, debate on the Vinson proposal be limited to 10 minutes and debate on the bill be limited to 10 minutes, and that no limitation be fixed on the other proposals which will follow.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think that would be agreeable.

Mr. McNARY. I think it would be agreeable to those with whom I have consulted.

Mr. HARRISON. In view of the fact that there are so many matters on the calendar, and we are desirous of expediting their consideration, I withdraw my request for unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee. On that question the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Burke	Dieterich	Hayden
Ashurst	Byrd	Donahey	Johnson
Austin	Byrnes	Duffy	Keyes
Bachman	Capper	Fletcher	King
Bankhead	Caraway	Frazier	La Follette
Barkley	Carey	Gerry	Lewis
Bilbo	Clark	Gibson	Logan
Black	Connally	Glass	Lonergan
Bone	Coolidge	Gore	Long
Borah	Copeland	Hale	McAdoo
Brown	Costigan	Harrison	McCarran
Bulkley	Couzens	Hastings	McGill
Bulow	Dickinson	Hatch	McKellar

McNary	O'Mahoney	Schwellenbach	Trammell
Metcalf	Overton	Sheppard	Truman
Minton	Pittman	Shipstead	Tydings
Moore	Pope	Smith	Vandenberg
Murphy	Radcliffe	Steiwer	Van Nuys
Murray	Robinson	Thomas, Okla.	Wagner
Neely	Russell	Thomas, Utah	Walsh
Norris	Schall	Townsend	White
Nye

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH. If this amendment shall be voted down, the vote will recur on the so-called "Harrison amendment"?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator states the situation correctly.

Mr. SMITH. And if that shall be voted down, the matter before us will be the Patman bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The House bill. The Senator states the matter correctly.

Mr. SMITH. Very well. Then I hope all Senators will vote "nay."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, there are a number of absentees on this side of the Chamber whose position on this amendment I am unable to ascertain in our effort to get pairs for those who are with us. Some of them I know to be with us, and I know none of them to be against us. The uncertainty of this amendment reaching a vote today no doubt accounts for the large number of absentees—six of them on this side alone.

I think those of us who favor the bonus as such, who really want the soldiers' bonus paid in a liberal way—that is, in accordance with the Patman bill—have all pretty well reached the understanding among ourselves which I get from my friend the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] that we ought to vote down all these amendments, which would leave the Patman bill before us. Do I understand correctly?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yesterday I made the statement that I was for the Patman bill. I made the further statement that as between the Vinson bill and the Harrison bill I should vote for the Vinson bill; but, of course, I am against the Vinson bill, and I am against the Harrison bill and for the Patman bill.

As a matter of regularity, after 24 hours' deliberation, I have come to the conclusion that I shall cast my vote against all amendments until the Patman bill is reached. I shall vote against the Vinson bill because I prefer the Patman bill to the Vinson bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, with the permission of the Senator from Louisiana, of course the issue presented by the vote now to be taken is not between either the Harrison bill or the Vinson bill and the Patman bill. It is between the Harrison bill and the Vinson bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I realize that.

Mr. CLARK. So that a vote against the Vinson bill as a substitute for the Harrison bill is a vote against full payment of the bonus in behalf of partial payment of the bonus.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I realize that; but it occurs to me that it is the best parliamentary procedure for those who favor the soldiers, who favor the enactment of bonus legislation, those who really want to help the soldiers and help this legislation, to vote against all amendatory proposals—to vote against the Vinson bill, and then, when the Harrison bill comes before the Senate for a vote, likewise to vote against the Harrison bill, and to vote against all amendments to the Harrison bill. In the end, if we have a majority, we can clear the calendar of substitutes and amendments and finally get down to the Patman bill, which has passed the House on three separate occasions. That will present the issue in square-toed fashion, and those who are for the Patman bill will have a chance to vote for it, and those who are against it will likewise have a chance to vote against it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Just a moment. I promised to yield to the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE]. Then I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BONE. I am somewhat in doubt as to the effect of certain votes with respect to the final disposition of the so-called "Patman bill." We confront a very peculiar situation, one which I have never before seen during my term of service in this body.

If the so-called "Vinson bill", which is now proposed to be attached to the pending bill as an amendment in the nature of a substitute, shall carry, that will end any opportunity to vote further on the so-called "Patman bill", as I understand the parliamentary situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not understand the parliamentary situation.

Mr. BONE. That is what I wish to have made plain to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has not made a parliamentary inquiry. If he would do so, the Chair would directly answer it. The Senator merely stated what he understood.

Mr. BONE. I want some advice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator desires, the Chair will make a statement as to his understanding of the parliamentary situation.

The House of Representatives passed a bill, which was sent to the Senate and referred to the Finance Committee of the Senate. The Finance Committee reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out everything after the enacting clause and to insert certain language, the so-called "Harrison amendment."

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment. If the amendment in the nature of a substitute should be agreed to, then the question would come on the Harrison amendment as amended, and if that were not agreed to, it would leave the House bill as it came from the House. If the Harrison amendment as amended were agreed to, no further amendment would be in order.

The Chair thinks that covers the situation pretty thoroughly.

Mr. LONG. I yield now to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Chair has stated what I wanted to develop, and I will wait and claim the floor in my own right.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that the parliamentary situation is very plain and very simple and that no one need be deceived on account of the parliamentary status.

As I see it, the first vote, upon which we have ordered a roll call, is a choice between the committee bill and the Vinson bill. The Patman bill does not enter into this vote, and any Senator who favors the Patman bill to all the other bills will not on the first vote have an opportunity to vote for or against the Patman bill, but he will assert his choice, by his vote, as between the committee bill and the Vinson bill. If the amendment shall be agreed to and the Vinson bill shall be substituted, then the committee bill will be out of the picture, and instead of the committee bill we will have the Vinson bill.

We must then vote upon the question as to whether we will substitute the Vinson bill for the bill as it came from the House, which is the Patman bill, and the choice will then come between the Vinson bill and the Patman bill.

If the vote shall be against the Vinson bill on the first vote, then the Vinson bill will be out of the picture, and the choice will come between the committee bill and the Patman bill.

So, whatever happens, Senators are not going to be denied the right, under the parliamentary situation, to vote their sentiments upon the Patman bill, which is the House bill.

It does not seem to me that the parliamentary situation is in any way obscured so as to prevent Senators from voting for the bill of their choice.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana allow me a moment?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. There are two substitutes proposed. As the Senator from Nebraska has said, we must choose which one we want, or would take, between those two.

The psychology of the situation is such that if we vote for the Vinson bill the impression will be that perhaps we might take it in preference to the Patman bill. Those of us who really believe that we have backed and filled and used all kinds of tactics, from every conceivable source, opposed to the bonus and who believe in the bonus being honestly and fully met and paid, ought to vote down any and every attempt to distract the minds of Senators from the issue.

Do Senators intend to give the soldier an honest, straightforward payment, or do they want to monkey around and pay him a partial bonus, and chip off here and there? Let us meet the issue which is before us.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LONG. I will yield once more to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator from South Carolina had the floor.

Mr. LONG. I do not mind yielding to the Senator again.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose the Senator from South Carolina prefers the Patman bill to anything else, and wants an opportunity to express himself by his vote. In the present parliamentary situation he is going to have that opportunity. But suppose as a matter of strategy the Senate, believing the Patman bill to be better than any other of the three, proceeds on the theory that it ought to vote as between the committee bill and the Vinson bill, and should vote down the proposed substitute; and then suppose on the final vote, which would be then between the committee bill and the Patman bill, the substitute, the committee bill, were agreed to; then the Senator would be in the attitude of never having voted for the Vinson bill, which he would prefer to the committee bill.

Mr. SMITH. I do not prefer either.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. SMITH. I think it is a matter of choosing between tweedledum and tweedledee. We are acting here as if we had not courage enough to meet an issue.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not believe that either the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from South Carolina heard me yesterday. I can clarify the atmosphere, if I may have the attention of both Senators for just a moment.

This is our predicament: There are about 21 Republicans, as near as I can count them—I do not count the Senator from Nebraska in that particular list of Republicans, or in many other lists, sometimes; I count him a universal Democrat. [Laughter in the galleries.] I mean by that——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The occupants of the galleries will refrain from laughter. The Sergeant at Arms has been instructed to deliver to each visitor a slip of paper setting forth the rules of the Senate, and I am sure that, as our guests, the occupants of the galleries will respect the request of the Senate, and refrain from laughter and other demonstrations.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, when I referred to the Senator from Nebraska as a "universal Democrat" I meant that the logic of the Senator from Nebraska follows not only the logic of Lincoln but that of Jefferson. Lincoln was a believer in and a follower of Jefferson, and had Jefferson lived at a time later than Lincoln he probably would have been a follower of Lincoln. The Senator from Nebraska is one who still really votes in line with the Jeffersonian and Lincolnian policies.

There are about 21 or 22 Republicans who do not dare vote for the Harrison bill as against the Patman will, but who will vote for the Vinson bill as against the Patman bill.

The Vinson bill does not provide for payment of the bonus, any more than a resolution of a chamber of commerce would pay the bonus. It merely provides a suggestion, and there would have to be another act of Congress passed appropriating the money, providing a way of paying the bonus, even though the Vinson bill were enacted. So the Vinson bill is what might be termed "a void"; it is just a shadow, with no substance to it. Therefore we are here in a shadow-boxing game.

There are some of us who claim, of course, to be a little bit more righteous in our advocacy of the soldiers' bonus than some others whom we know. They may make contrary claims, which we would dispute. But those of us who are trying to get the bonus across, who really want to give the soldiers something, realize that we are in a situation where we have to keep the conservative Democrats and the conservative Republicans divided, or the soldiers will not get a cent.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to inject myself into a controversy, but the able Senator from Louisiana has suggested that there are Senators here who desire to shift their responsibility.

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. ASHURST. In my judgment, the situation is unique. I assert that never before within my memory has there been a question upon which each and every Senator was more anxious to vote than the question before us. Every Senator is anxious that the country should know whether he is for the Patman bill, the Vinson bill, or the Harrison bill. Whatever may be our faults of omission or commission, I do not believe there is today even one Senator who wishes to hide his position as to any one of those bills.

I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], whose statement was as clear as a cameo, has pointed out just what we may do. I myself am for the Harrison bill. I wish to have the world know it, and I believe that every other Senator is equally as frank as am I, and is awaiting the opportunity to declare to the country where he stands.

Mr. President, the Senate of course has faults. Being human beings, we know we have some faults; but it so happens that on the bonus question we ought to be free—if I may employ a word which Stephen A. Douglas was wont to use—from any charge of tergiversation; we ought to be free from any charge of being evaders, because I repeat, in my judgment every Senator is now willing that the country should know how he stands on this question.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator is absolutely correct about that. There never was a time when Senators were so anxious to have it known how they stand on this question. However, I will say for the information of the Senator from Arizona, that I am going to vote with him for the first time, to show him how well I like him; I am going to vote with him the first time out of my regard for the Senator from Arizona.

The fact is we are trying to pay the soldiers some money. I care not what the motives of people may be, I am a practical politician, and I am trying to pay the soldiers this money, and I know from what I have learned, that I can get about 21 votes on the Republican side in favor of the Patman bill as against the Harrison bill which we cannot get in favor of the Patman bill as against the Vinson bill. That is a frank statement.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator from Louisiana entertains that view, the difficulty can be obviated by asking unanimous consent that the Senate vote first on the Patman bill.

Mr. LONG. I shall do that. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote first on the Patman bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I object.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Arizona sees what happens. I now want my friend from Arizona to know how honest I am in reference to this question.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not question my friend's honesty.

Mr. LONG. I understand, but I want the other Senators who might have questioned it to know about it.

Mr. President, the fact is that we are up against some very clever politicians. They know this business. I use the term "politician" in an honest sense. Many people do not feel that way about politicians. The Senator from South Carolina looks at me as though he felt I meant to cast some aspersion on him every time I use the term "politician", but I am using that term in an honorable sense. We are up against some very clever politicians. If the Republicans—and I have a very high regard for them whenever I can get them to act for a good purpose—it does not make any difference who he may be, for a vote is a vote in the Senate——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I suggest that my able friend from Louisiana should have a very high regard for the Republicans, but they should have a higher regard for him in view of the very great service he renders them.

Mr. LONG. That is the way the Senator from Illinois looks at this business, but the fact of the case is, Mr. President, that the Senator from Illinois sometimes can be mistaken. Unfortunately, I was not rendering the Republican Party a very good service when I was giving the Democrats my money last year and the year before, but I am now trying to render the Republican Party and the Democrats a joint service. I do not want them to get together. I know these folks. I mean those outside the Senate. I do not mean that any Senators would deal in any such manner. I mean the party leaders outside the Senate. I know that they have usually maneuvered matters so that the great bulk of the Democratic leadership in and out of the Congress goes right down the aisle with the great bulk of Republican leadership in and out of Congress, and we shall have to arrange so that they do not dare to be seen together or they will be together two-thirds of the time on every important bill. We shall have to see to it that they do not dare keep company and let the people find out they are kinsfolk. So if some of those who do not want any soldiers' bonus paid can vote for the Vinson bill over the Harrison bill, then they can afford to stand pat in favor of the Vinson bill against the Patman bill, but if we let the Harrison bill stay as it is, the same Senators are going to vote for the Patman bill against the Harrison bill. It is all right for them when they vote for the Vinson bill; then they can go out to the country and say, "We passed the proper law if the President had only appropriated and raised the money to pay the bonus." That is a particularly good political defense for them, but it does not provide the soldiers the bonus we are trying to give them.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. The American Legion officially endorsed the Vinson bill, did it not?

Mr. LONG. Not the American Legion. It was the legislative committee of the American Legion, I am told.

Mr. LOGAN. Was it not the executive committee?

Mr. LONG. And after that, the convention approved the Vinson bill. It was the legislative committee which first approved the Vinson bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, the Senator is not a member of the Legion? However, the Senator is perhaps familiar with the fact that under the constitution of the American Legion the governing body of the American Legion, the body representing the American Legion between conventions, is the national executive committee of the American Legion.

Mr. LONG. Composed of how many members?

Mr. CLARK. Composed of one member from each State, Territory, and insular possession, and certain past national officials.

Mr. LONG. Forty-eight.

Mr. CLARK. The action to which the Senator refers to as having been taken by the national legislative committee was taken by the national executive committee at a meeting called for that purpose.

Mr. LONG. My understanding is that when the convention met it endorsed the bonus, and the only bill pending at the time was the Patman bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. This morning I received a telegram from the member of the committee from Tennessee. He was in Indianapolis and he telegraphed me that the American Legion had instructed him to say that they were in favor of the Vinson bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. The executive committee, under the authority of the constitution of the American Legion, has endorsed the Vinson bill and the Senator says it pays nothing. Is it the Senator's opinion that this committee of the American Legion is deliberately attempting to deceive the veterans?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I wish to make a statement and then ask the Senator from Missouri a question. It has been stated on the floor that the Vinson bill, if adopted, would be of no more importance than a resolution passed by some outside body. Statement has been made on the floor that if the Vinson bill is adopted the Congress must hereafter introduce and pass the appropriation to pay the soldiers. Inasmuch as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has introduced the Vinson measure, I ask him in the time of the Senator from Louisiana to make a statement of just what the soldiers would get in the event the Vinson bill becomes a law?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I shall be glad to make a statement in my own time and not in the time of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator from Louisiana will further yield, I should like to make a statement, and then I will have no more to say about it.

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. First, I will say I am for the Vinson bill. Second, I am for the Harrison bill. And after that,. let nature take its course.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to amplify the question of my friend from Oklahoma, and make a statement. The statement is that a soldier will not get a thing on earth out of the Vinson bill unless there shall be further action by the Congress.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I have in my hand a copy of the Vinson bill and I shall read a line or two from it. This is the language which I read from the Vinson bill:

> Payment on account of such certificates—
> Meaning the adjusted-compensation certificates—
> shall be made in the manner hereafter provided in this act.

Then I look through the entire bill and I find this language, which is at the end of the bill:

> There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

That is all there is in the Vinson bill. Is there any other language anywhere in the bill which I have overlooked, I will ask the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LONG. No; there is not.

Mr. BONE. Where in the Vinson bill is the payment provided for?

Mr. LONG. If any Senator thinks the Vinson bill provides for the payment of the bonus, he ought either to be disbarred as a lawyer, if he is a lawyer, or I ought to be for thinking as I do with regard to what it provides. Any lawyer who thinks the language of the Vinson bill provides for paying the bonus ought to be disbarred, or if he is right I ought to be disbarred for being incompetent. If the 48 representatives of the American Legion, or 48 Senators from 48 States, drew that bill intending that it was going to pay the soldiers' bonus they would have done better never to have met. I am told that the leaders of the American Legion were not in favor of the bonus anyway, but that their rank and file were in favor of it, and voted for it over their heads, and when the members voted for a bonus what soldiers' bonus bill were they voting for? They were voting for the bill which HUEY LONG offered in the Senate, because it was the only bill there was in the Senate, and that was the Patman bill. They were voting for the bill which WRIGHT PATMAN offered in the House, because it was the only bill pending in the House. Then after they had endorsed the soldiers' bonus, and the Patman bill at that time being the only bonus bill pending, 48 men—and the chances are that the majority of the 48 did not want the convention to vote for the bonus anyway—go off by themselves and draw them up something which they call a bonus bill. You might just as well label a witch an angel as to label the Vinson bill a bonus bill. The Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] is exactly correct about it when he says that it is provided in the Vinson bill that "payment shall be made as hereinafter provided", and when we look further we find that it says, "We hereby authorize Congress to appropriate the money to pay the soldiers' bonus."

Mr. BONE. At some time!

Mr. LONG. At some time, somewhere, somehow. Does anyone mean to tell me that we need an act of Congress to authorize Congress to appropriate the money to pay the soldiers' bonus some time from now? What Member of the Senate is going to make any such statement as that?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think it ought to be said, and the Senator should be informed, that before the Appropriations Committee is authorized to make any appropriation there has to be a law providing for that appropriation. It would be out of order to put an appropriation in this bill. This bill authorizes an appropriation, and whenever the Congress authorizes an appropriation it is in order for any Senator to move to provide for it.

Mr. LONG. Then we ought to have passed the relief bill first and later come along with an appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. We have done it in every case.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. In every bill that is reported by the Appropriations Committee there must be an authority for the appropriation passed by Congress in order to make the money available.

Mr. LONG. The Senator does not mean to tell me that we have got to pass a bill and have it become a law before the Appropriations Committee can consider an appropriation for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, if the Senator is not familiar with the policy and practice, he is just not familiar with it, that is all.

Mr. LONG. According to that, the relief bill would have had to be passed first and then we would have had to pass another bill appropriating $4,880,000,000. That is not the law; nobody ever heard of such a law as that; at least, nobody else ever heard of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is just ignorant about it.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; the Senator from Tennessee does not understand what I am talking about.

Mr. COUZENS. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee to point out the authorization for the appropriation of $5,000,000,000 in the relief bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. That was purely a relief bill originating in the other House. The Senator knows, as I thought every other Senator knew, that before the Appropriations Committee has power to put an appropriation in a bill there must be some act of Congress authorizing the expenditure.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator please give me the reference to the authorization for the money appropriated by the relief bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I would have to look it up, because I do not know as to that particular measure. That bill was brought before the Senate while I was out of the country, and when I came here I found it pending. But under the rules of the Senate there must first be an authorization. The Senator will recall that the construction of Boulder Dam was first authorized and then afterward an appropriation was made; so as to every other bill there must be an authorization for the appropriation.

Mr. LONG. The payment of the bonus has already been authorized; these adjusted-compensation certificates have been authorized for about 7, 8, or 9 years. So we do not have to have another act to authorize Congress to pay them. If that is the kind of thing for which the Senator is contending, then I will say the bonus has been authorized for a period of 9 years. Why do we need another act authorizing Congress to do something that it has already been authorized to do?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly the Senator from Louisiana is not contending that an authorization to pay the bonus in 1925 could be taken as authority for an appropriation to pay the bonus in 1935?

Mr. LONG. No; but the Senator from Louisiana is a lawyer, has practiced before most of the courts of the country, made a pretty good living, and did not have to have anybody before him to get any law practice, and he knows a legislative body can pass a bill and appropriate money for it at the same time. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States and in no other constitution that ever held anything else, and no court on the face of the civilized or the uncivilized earth ever held to the contrary. You cannot hand us that hind teat; we will not take it. Senators come in here with a bill proposing to authorize the Congress to pay something that Congress was authorized to pay 10 years ago, and they hand that kind of a thing to us. I discern that an enormous amount of remarkable enthusiasm has been engendered here in favor of the Vinson bill since it has been found out that it does not propose to pay anything. It is remarkable how enthusiastic a certain bloc in the Senate that has always fought the bonus has suddenly become for the Vinson bill since the Senator from Washington rose and the Senator from Oklahoma rose and unmasked the whole performance. The minute the Senator from Oklahoma rose and the Senator from Washington rose behind him and showed that the Vinson bill provided specifically for nothing, that bill received remarkably enthusiastic support from the bloc in this body that always has voted against the bonus. It is remarkable, but, perhaps, is just one of those coincidences that a blind man can see and a deaf man can hear.

When I offered the bonus bill here the last time, the Patman bill, did anybody else offer any other kind of a bill? No; nothing of the kind happened. When the Representative from Texas offered his bill, did anyone else offer any other kind of a bill? Nothing of the kind happened. We are now trying to get for the boys who are lying in the hospitals and for those who are out of work, who went away with the flags flying and the bands playing, the right to be paid this money that the United States of America owes them, and we are met with one kind of a parliamentary strategy at one door and another club at another door and another one at another door, and we are told all the time just to put the money a little bit nearer the reach of the soldier, but never quite put it entirely in his grasp.

Is anybody going to contend that the Patman bill is not constitutional? No. On the contrary, everyone knows it is,

and the reason some of the Members of this body are not going to want to vote for the Patman bill is because of the fact that the Patman bill, if enacted, will pay the money which is due.

I went over on the Republican side this morning and I went around the Democratic side. I do not mind being seen over on the Republican side; I would just about as soon be seen with one of them as the other. There is only one difference between them. Whenever I see the Democratic leaders get up here and hear them make speeches cussing out the Republicans, and then the Republican leaders getting up and making speeches cussing out the Democrats, I am reminded of my old cousin, Jim Terrell, down in Louisiana, who told me about the time he thought his lawyer was going to whip his opponent's lawyer. It looked to him like his lawyer was going to jump on the other man's lawyer every minute; but the first thing he knew—after his lawsuit had been lost—he saw both his lawyer and the other man's lawyer go out and have a drink together, apparently as if there had never been any lawsuit. [Laughter.]

I have seen too much sham battling in the United States Senate. I come back from the woods. I know when the imagination touches me, imagination which the crude rudiments of refinement have never yet erased, and I know that we have got to have a majority of votes to provide specifically that the soldiers shall have this money paid to them or they are not ever going to get a 5-cent piece, and that if the Congress should adjourn after passing this nefarious bill they will not get a 5-cent piece. I will read from section 5:

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Now just hold on a minute. I am going to show the Senate something. If my friends from Missouri and Kentucky had not written this provision in the bill, as they did, it might have been that there would have been one chance out of a thousand to have paid this money from some unappropriated source or some money not otherwise appropriated, as was done in the case of the relief bill, but, oh, no, they provide:

The adjusted-service certificates issued under the authority of such act are hereby declared to be immediately payable. Payments on account of such certificates shall be made in the manner hereafter provided in this act.

Inclusio unius est exclusio alterius.

Is that right, I will ask my friend from Illinois?

Mr. LEWIS. Not quite; but it is well meant. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. In other words, Mr. President, this act has specifically dedicated the particular sum, the particular manner, and none of it may be used except such as is described in the Vinson bill, and the Vinson bill says that a certificate shall be paid in the manner prescribed by this bill.

Inclusio unius est exclusio alterius.

What is the manner expressed by this bill? Here it is. My friend from Indiana is trying to compete with me in my quotation of Latin, but I am not going to let anybody into the RECORD now.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The manner provided by this bill is set forth in sections 3 and 4, and not in section 5, to which the Senator from Louisiana has been referring. The manner provided in this bill is—

SEC. 3. (a) An application for payment under this act may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate (1) personally by the veterans, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed.

The authorization contained in section 5 does not purport to be the manner of paying the bonus prescribed in the other section. That comprises an authorization for the appropriation out of the Treasury that may be carried in any regular appropriation bill or be offered as an amendment on the floor to any regular appropriation bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, sections 3 and 4 may be a part of it, but section 5 reads as follows:

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is in exact accord with the rules of the Senate. Rule XVI, paragraph 2, has this to say on this very subject:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing amendments proposing new or general legislation.

And, of course, this is general legislation.

Mr. LONG. It is not new.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not new, but it is general legislation.

Mr. LONG. That is not the question.

Mr. McKELLAR. The rule continues:

And if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate containing amendments proposing new or general legislation, a point of order may be made against the bill; and if the point is sustained, the bill shall be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

That has led to the uniform practice in the Senate that for every appropriation there must be authority; there is no escape from it.

Mr. LONG. Let me see the rule.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will show it to the Senator. It is just the usual, ordinary, everyday practice of the Senate.

Mr. LONG. The Senator had to get away from the rule and refer to some ordinary practice.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I am not, because I am just as much in favor of the soldiers' bonus as is the Senator from Louisiana. I have time and again voted for the soldiers' bonus, and I will do so again.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. I asked the Senator from Louisiana to yield in order that I may direct a question to the Senator from Tennessee, who is a good parliamentarian.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I am a very poor parliamentarian, but I know the practice of the Appropriations Committee, where I have served for a long time.

Mr. BONE. These suggestions are rather confusing to some of us who have not that familiarity with the rules bred by long association and experience with them. However, I have in my hand the Emergency Relief Act of 1935. There probably are provisions in it that I have not been able to put my finger on.

Mr. McKELLAR. My attention was called to it a few moments ago. I do not recall what the facts are about that particular bill.

Mr. BONE. With the consent of the Senator from Louisiana may I read this language to the Senator from Tennessee:

There is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $4,000,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Similar language to that is in every appropriation bill. The $4,000,000,000 measure was an appropriation measure, purely an appropriation measure. Laws had been enacted previous to that time providing for public works and other things which were to be done with the money appropriated in that measure. That language is in every appropriation. That was an appropriation measure while the bill now before us is a legislative bill.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield a moment further?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I understand that clearly enough, but the discussion has revolved around the proposition that there must be a preliminary law authorizing the appropriation. There was no bill preceding and no legislation preceding which authorized that $4,000,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; there was a great deal of legislation relating to public works. I do not remember that there was a specific authorization of a specific amount. We can appropriate whatever the Congress wants to appropriate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The question of jurisdiction of the committee comes into this matter. The Appropriations Committee cannot report to the Senate what is known as a "legislative bill." When it reports an appropriation bill presumably it is supposed to be a bill providing an authorization, but it does not have to do that.

With reference to the $4,000,000,000 Public Works bill, there had been no specific authorization covering the entire program contemplated by that measure. That was expected to be expended at once. It is the rule, which has been referred to by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], that amendments to a general appropriation bill involving new legislation or substantive legislation are not in order. The committee itself could not report such amendments without having them subject to a point of order. There is a difference always between a mere authorization, which has to be followed by an appropriation, and the appropriation itself.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] seemed to catch the word "new" legislation as if this were new. Of course that is not the meaning of the rule. The word "new" applies to legislation which is not in existence or has not heretofore been enacted or authorized. The fact that it has been talked about for a century would not take it out of the definition of "new" as applied by the rule itself.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, we have had a lot of argument about something that does not mean a thing in the world. What we finally get down to is that the Senator from Tennessee found that we had appropriated $4,800,000,000 and violated the rule he had in mind, and he did not know anything about it. If that is so, why worry about an appropriation in this instance? As a matter of fact, this proposed legislation is neither new nor general, because we have already committed ourselves to pay the bonus, and it is not general because it only applies to the ex-soldier.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On page 158 of the hearings General Hines testified that to pay the soldiers' bonus under the Vinson bill would necessitate an appropriation of $2,263,545,684. In order to test the desire and wishes of those in favor of the soldiers' bonus, I ask permission at this time, in the time of the Senator from Louisiana, to submit a new section to the Vinson bill and ask that it may be read at the desk.

Mr. LONG. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further before the amendment is read?

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senate has the power to change the nature of this section by striking out the word "authorized" and making it a direct appropriation.

Mr. LONG. We are doing that now. Listen to the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma asks permission to have read a new section, which he proposes to offer to the so-called "Vinson bill."

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. There is hereby appropriated, from any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,263,545,684 to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senate cannot initiate an appropriation, and there is no authority of law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the opinion of the Chair that there is no constitutional limitation upon the Senate to initiate an appropriation. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. LONG. Has the Chair ruled that we can offer the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. LONG. Then the next thing is to vote the appropriation. I know we will have no difficulty in doing that.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Has not the Senate at this time the privilege and the power to perfect the substitute known as the "Vinson bill"?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then, if the Senator from Louisiana will yield for that purpose, I offer the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. LONG. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, which has just been read, to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am sure my Republican friends will now be glad to vote for this appropriation. I am glad to see us strike this note of harmony. I want to thank my friend from Tennessee for the suggestion. We are all coming together now, either way the cat hops, to get the money for the soldier.

Unless there is opposition I am going to ask unanimous consent that the amendment be adopted. If there is no objection, I should like to have that done. I do not want to do that, however, with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] absent. I will ask that the Senator from Missouri be sent for. I am sure he will be happy to have this done; it will avoid some trouble.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Do I understand the Senator to ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as adopted?

Mr. LONG. If there is no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not the customary way of adopting amendments. Senators will want to vote on it. We do not adopt amendments by unanimous consent, except mere formal amendments.

Mr. LONG. It is only a formal amendment. It involves only $2,000,000,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. That would be regarded by the Senator from Louisiana probably as a mere pro forma amendment, like striking out the last word, as is done in the House, though we have no rule allowing that in the Senate.

Mr. LONG. But the bill authorizes the appropriation, authorizes the Congress to make the appropriation, and the Senator from Tennessee explained to us that this is only formal. I do not want to be debating a useless matter. If we are all agreed that we will perfect the Vinson bill by this amendment making provision for the appropriation, then I should not be consuming time and arguing a matter on which we are all agreed.

Would the Senator from Kentucky oppose the amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not have to answer the Senator from Louisiana whether I oppose or approve the amendment. If it is to be adopted, it ought to be voted on and not agreed to by unanimous consent. Such a request is a little bit out of the ordinary. I believe in pursuing the ordinary course.

Mr. LONG. I am not going to delay the matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Frankly, if the Vinson bill, or any other bill, is to be passed to pay the bonus, I think it ought to provide for a direct appropriation to pay it——

Mr. LONG. That is right.

Mr. BARKLEY. Although there is a good deal to be said in favor of the authorization. The direct appropriation assumes that everybody is going to apply for payment of the bonus and, therefore, the maximum amount would be carried in the appropriation, whereas it might be that only half of the number would apply or only half of the amount would be needed.

Mr. LONG. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In offering the amendment, I do not disturb section 5, which is the authorization provision. If the bill should become a law, it would carry the authorization, and then the next section would make the appropriation. Following the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky, I desire to modify my amendment to include certain words, and I will ask to have the modified amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Oklahoma modifies his amendment by inserting after the numerals the words " or so much thereof as may be necessary ", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. There is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,263,545,184, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield further?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If this is to be a direct appropriation, there is no need to have an authorization for it. It is perfectly silly to have one section authorizing the appropriation and the next succeeding section making the appropriation. There is no need to make two bites of it. If it is to be an appropriation, it ought to be an appropriation, and there is no need for an authorization.

Mr. LONG. It does not hurt anybody's feelings to have the authorization.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the interest of economy it ought not to be stated twice unless it is necessary. It will require considerable economy to work out the proposition.

Mr. LONG. It does not hurt anybody's feelings. I do not want to delay a vote on the pending amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Oklahoma. I should want to be heard on the matter otherwise, but I should like to have a vote on the amendment now.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On my amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the request seconded?

Mr. LONG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	La Follette	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Copeland	Lewis	Robinson
Austin	Costigan	Logan	Russell
Bachman	Couzens	Lonergan	Schall
Bankhead	Dickinson	Long	Schwellenbach
Barkley	Dieterich	McAdoo	Sheppard
Bilbo	Donahey	McCarran	Shipstead
Black	Fletcher	McGill	Smith
Bone	Frazier	McKellar	Steiwer
Borah	Gerry	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Brown	Gibson	Metcalf	Thomas, Utah
Bulkley	Glass	Minton	Townsend
Bulow	Gore	Moore	Trammell
Burke	Hale	Murphy	Truman
Byrd	Harrison	Murray	Tydings
Byrnes	Hastings	Neely	Vandenberg
Capper	Hatch	Norris	Van Nuys
Caraway	Hayden	Nye	Wagner
Carey	Johnson	Overton	Walsh
Clark	Keyes	Pittman	White
Connally	King	Pope

Mr. LEWIS. I reannounce the absence of certain Senators, and the reasons therefor, as given by me on the previous roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, while I do not by any means agree with the view of the Senator from Oklahoma as to the nugatory effect of a mere authorization as against an appropriation—because, to my mind, that is the orderly legislative method of proceeding—so far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment and make this an appropriation instead of an authorization.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at this point may I be pardoned for interrupting the Senator?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to ask if it be not true that under this amendment the bill would carry more money than would be carried under the Patman bill?

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that that statement is perfectly correct. The Vinson bill carries something like $100,000,000 more than the Patman bill. Of course, the Harrison bill carries very much less than either one of the others.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I suggested a moment ago to the Senator from Louisiana, I suppose, of course, none of this money will be paid out to an ex-service man who does not apply for it.

Mr. CLARK. That is provided in the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand; but if the Senator should accept the amendment to his own substitute, and it should be agreed to, there would be a possibility of our finding ourselves in the position of appropriating millions of dollars more than would ever be called for by the ex-service men. Therefore, it would seem more orderly to make the authorization, and have the money appropriated as it is needed from time to time and called for by the ex-service men.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that, so far as I am concerned, I think the orderly, regular process of making an authorization, and then having the appropriations brought in by the Appropriations Committee from time to time in due course, which is uniformly followed in the Congress, is preferable to the plan proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma; but since there is a very wide-spread belief that to take two bites of the cherry in this particular case would tend toward delay, and that following the precedent set on the public works joint resolution it is desirable to make an outright appropriation, I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to accept the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING]. Has that Senator voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. GLASS. Then I shall have to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote " nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MURRAY. My colleague the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is compelled to be absent. If he were present, he would vote " yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I regret to announce that the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] is detained on account of illness in his family; and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] is detained on account of illness.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] is detained at a conference at the White House. I am advised that if present and voting he would vote " yea."

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is necessarily absent on an official mission of the Senate to the Virgin Islands.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

I am not advised how any of these Senators would vote on this question.

I also announce the necessary absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK].

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—57

Adams	Coolidge	McAdoo	Schall
Austin	Copeland	McCarran	Schwellenbach
Bachman	Costigan	McGill	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dickinson	McKellar	Shipstead
Bilbo	Dieterich	Minton	Smith

NOT VOTING—15

Bailey	Duffy	Guffey	Reynolds
Barbour	George	Maloney	Wagner
Cutting	Glass	Norbeck	Wheeler
Davis	Gore	O'Mahoney

So the amendment of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to the amendment of Mr. CLARK in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I did not vote on the roll call which has just been concluded. When it began, I was seeking to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. THOMAS].

I will have the proposed amendment read. My amendment would have given the President the power and the discretion to pay the bonus out of the moneys heretofore appropriated under the $5,000,000,0000 relief measure. If I could have offered my amendment and it had been agreed to, then I would have voted for the amendment of my colleague as so amended.

I should like to have the amendment read into the RECORD, in order that Senators may see what I have in mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

SEC. —. Notwithstanding any other provision contained in this act, the President is hereby granted the power and the option to make payment of such adjusted-service certificates—with the consent of the owner—in whole or in part—in cash or partly in cash or partly in bonds, immediately or on the installment plan (less in any case of payment in full the amount of any loan or indebtedness secured by such certificate) and in order to make such payments the President is authorized to make use of any unexpended balance, not exceeding $1,700,000,000 of the moneys appropriated in Public, No. 11, Seventy-fourth Congress, making provision for relief purposes, approved April 8, 1935.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in the committee I offered this amendment to the bill which was reported, the Harrison bill. It was rejected by the committee. As I stated a moment ago, I was seeking an opportunity to offer this as an amendment to the amendment of my colleague, when the roll call began.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, is an amendment pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], as amended.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I have just been advised by the representatives of the Veterans' Administration that the Vinson bill does not provide for transferring the money now in the adjusted-service-certificate fund, and if the bonus is to be paid, of course, that fund should be made available and transferred to the regular fund, from which payments may be made.

Because of this condition, I offer a new section, to become section 7, which I now ask to have reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 7. In addition to all other purposes for which it is available, the adjusted-service certificate fund is hereby made available for any payment authorized by this act.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have conferred with the representatives of the Veterans' Administration, and if there is a possibility or probability that the so-called "substitute" which is now being perfected will be agreed to, such a provision as this ought to go into it. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am entirely willing to accept the amendment. I think it is desirable and necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment, as amended, of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I wish to occupy the time of the Senate for merely a moment.

The Committee on Finance has reported the amendment to which the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is offered as a substitute, in the belief and in the full confidence that if it should be agreed to by the Congress the bill would be signed by the President of the United States.

I say without question that if the so-called "Vinson bill" shall be passed it will be vetoed by the President of the United States and the matter will be back here in our hands.

If the Senate desires to engage in a sham battle by voting for a proposition, and have it sent back as the result of a Presidential veto, which will not be overridden by the Senate, the ex-service men will get nothing. On the contrary, if the proposal now offered shall be defeated and the recommendation of the Finance Committee shall prevail, there will be a law upon the statute books, for I say with full confidence that the bill will be signed by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say. I hope that the substitute will be defeated.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have sought the advice of my friends on this side of the Chamber, and some on the other side, and they tell me now that we are all in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the committee amendment known as the "Harrison bill." We now favor the Vinson bill as a substitute for the Harrison bill. I shall vote "yea" on this question, and the Senator from Oklahoma tells me he will vote "yea." In other words, we are going to get the bonus paid. Whether we have the Patman bill or the Vinson bill, the bonus is going to be paid if we vote "yea" and adopt either one of these bills.

After we have adopted this amendment we will have a chance to say which we prefer as between the Patman and the Vinson bills, but now, since the Senator from Missouri has met us more than halfway, we ought to be with him and vote in favor of the Vinson substitute for the Harrison bill.

Mr. GORE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to be recognized?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have no remarks to make, but I desire to offer an amendment to the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will present his amendment.

Mr. GORE. I present an amendment to be inserted as a new title. I will ask the Senator from Missouri to pay special attention to the amendment as it is read. Perhaps he will be willing to accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the amendment, as amended, of Mr. CLARK it is proposed to insert the following:

TITLE II

SECTION 201. That the President is authorized to enter into agreements with the several foreign governments which are indebted to the United States to readjust such indebtedness, or to refund or convert in pursuance of such agreements the bonds or other obligations of such governments now held by the United States, and to obtain immediate payment of a portion of such readjusted indebtedness in accordance with the provisions of section 202 of this act.

SEC. 202. The first condition of any such agreement shall be that the foreign government entering into the same shall, prior to November 11, 1935, pay or make provision for the payment of, in such form as may be agreed upon, a sum which bears the same proportion to $1,750,000,000 that the readjusted indebtedness of such government bears to the total readjusted indebtedness of foreign governments to the United States, made hereunder or such other sum as may be agreed to by the President. Such sum or any part thereof when collected or realized shall be used as far as necessary or available to pay the difference between the amount paid on said adjusted-service certificates, respectively, in pursuance of title I hereof and the face value of such certificates less, in any case of payment in full, the amount of any loan or indebtedness secured by such certificate as provided in section 3 of title I of this act: Provided, That any part of such sum not required and used for such purpose shall be used to redeem the bonds issued in pursuance of title I of this act.

SEC. 203. The President is further authorized to agree to accept from any foreign government which shall comply with the preceding section full or partial payment, or security for payment, of any balance of the readjusted indebtedness which may be agreed upon in any or all of the following forms:

(a) By the delivery of bonds of such government, or other acceptable securities, to the United States, which bonds shall not be sold or disposed by the United States except when the United States is in a state of war as the result of a formal declaration by Congress.

(b) By guaranteed credits in the central bank of the signatory power or such other bank as may be agreed upon, said credits to be available and availed of by the United States only when in such a state of war.

(c) By selling or supplying to the United States, when in such a state of war, ships or shipping facilities or munitions or other military equipment or supplies, at a price not in excess of the cost of production in the country producing and supplying the same, in an amount agreed upon in pursuance of this act.

SEC. 204. The President is authorized to enter into a special agreement with Great Britain to readjust the amount of its indebtedness to the United States so that the ratio of reduction of its original indebtedness will be the same as that heretofore applied in revising and refunding the indebtedness owed to the United States by the Republic of France, upon condition that the Government of Great Britain stipulate to provide or supply the United States, when the latter is engaged in war, with tin and rubber at prices prevailing at the time of delivery. Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit a further readjustment of the indebtedness of Great Britain in accordance with the preceding sections of this act.

SEC. 205. Whenever the President shall enter into an agreement with any foreign government in pursuance of this title he shall then and thereupon be authorized to suspend the operation of Public, No. 151, Seventy-third Congress (the Johnson Act), respecting such government and its nationals, so long as, and only so long as, he shall find it consistent with the public interest to do so, and he shall have authority to prescribe suitable rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this section.

SEC. 206. The President is authorized to prescribe the necessary and proper rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this title.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, let me say that, so far as I am personally concerned, I am entirely in sympathy with the purpose sought to be achieved by the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. However, in view of the fact that a large number of Senators are interested in the substitute which I have proposed for the committee amendment, I do not feel that I individually am justified in accepting an amendment which introduces another and highly controversial subject. Therefore, much as I am in sympathy with the aim of the Senator from Oklahoma, I shall be forced to vote against the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have from time to time brought to the attention of the Senate my wish to have the debts due us from foreign governments paid. I have often gone so far as to cast criticism on the governments which have deferred payment, and others which have declined to pay either principal or interest.

Mr. President, it will be recalled by the able Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who presents the pending amendment, that we have an act of Congress which forbids the settlement of these debts except by the act and action of Congress. The eminent Senator from Oklahoma now tenders an amendment which carries with it directions that we shall have commercial dealings and international and diplomatic dealings, which I feel, sir, tend a great deal directly to oppose the action which we have taken with regard to the payment of the debts. We are by this proposition of the Senator from Oklahoma asked to cancel part of the debts and compromise the remainder.

I respectfully suggest that the President may be authorized to enter into any arrangement looking to the payment of these debts which he feels the best, and any adjustment he feels the most appropriate, and from which shall be obtained for the Government the largest sum of money. Then such conclusion will have to be submitted to the whole Congress. The proposition would have to be adopted or rejected according to the previous law which Congress passed on the subject.

To present this particular amendment at this time to the present measure would involve the measure in complication to such an extent that I feel it would hold up its passage, and that there would be debate on the subject which would hold up the final consideration of the measure for a considerable portion of the remainder of the immediate session of Congress.

On the other hand, I feel it offers a qualification or limitation in behalf of these debts which I cannot accept. I feel that the foreign government debtors should pay the debts as contracted, unless the President of the United States for reasons submitted to this honorable body and ratified, should conclude to the contrary, and that conclusion could not be binding unless we, as Congress, should wish to adopt it.

I respectfully protest against anything which would deprive Congress of the right to collect the foreign debts as contracted. The measure presented by the honorable Senator from Oklahoma, if added to the bonus bill, will prevent this body and the whole Congress from giving due and proper consideration to a separate subject. For that reason, as much as I should be glad to give my approval to any proposition presented by the Senator from Oklahoma, I take the liberty of opposing the amendment that would release or reduce the payment of these debts.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment. This amendment was drawn with the intention of offering it to the Harrison bill itself. It would have to be modified before it would be strictly in order with reference to the pending amendment.

I entirely agree with the Senator from Illinois that the debtor nations ought to pay their debts. I think debtors generally ought to pay their debts.

Mr. President, nothing is more certain than that these debtor nations will never pay these debts in full. That is a fixed fact.

It is equally certain that the Congress of the United States will never cancel these debts outright. That is a fixed fact.

It is no less certain that these debts obstruct and choke the channels of international trade. They obstruct commerce. They hinder recovery. They are like debris in the avenues of international trade and commerce. The present status militates against the debtors and it militates against the United States as a creditor nation. It serves the interests of neither.

We ought to look the facts in the face. We are now in a dilemma from which there seems little if any escape.

The amendment which I have offered empowers the President to enter into agreements with the debtor nations, the one fixed condition being that they pay or provide cash enough to retire the adjusted-service certificates.

If the debtor nations will pay anything they will pay the certificates held by the men who fought and bled in their defense. If the debtor nations will not pay those they will not pay anything, and if that be true, the sooner we know the truth the better. There is no point in deceiving ourselves, and there is no point in continuing a condition which does not injure our debtors alone. If it injured them alone, that would raise a different question and might suggest a different policy.

The existing situation with reference to foreign government debts militates against the United States. It obstructs our commerce. It hinders our recovery. It protracts this depression. It is neither the part of wisdom nor statesmanship to perpetuate a condition which injures everybody and serves no one.

In addition to that, if I may be indulged so unusual a remark—if the President, through negotiation, could prevail on the debtor countries to provide cash enough to retire these adjusted-service certificates it would obviate the necessity of imposing additional taxes upon the American taxpayers. It would relieve them of this burden. I doubt not that the Senators themselves would rather see the debtor nations provide the means and ways of payment than to impose this additional obligation on their government, their fellow citizens, the overburdened taxpayers of the United States.

Let me repeat, if I may do so, that I for one want to take the "ax" out of "tax" and take the ax off the necks of the American taxpayer. I doubt not that in that sentiment the soldiers will agree with me.

If my amendment were adopted I could vote for the pending measure.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] relates to a subject matter entirely different from that which is involved in the legislation the Senate is now considering. Moreover, it concerns a subject matter of the very greatest importance. It has not been considered or passed upon by any standing committee of the Senate.

I doubt whether the Senate should authorize the cancelation of the greater portion of existing war debts due this Government from other nations upon the conditions stated in the amendment. It may be true that it will never be possible to collect the full amount of those debts; it may be true that the existence of the obligations tends to interfere with international commerce; but it is also true that the burden of those obligations must be borne by someone. If the obligations are not to be paid by the governments that entered into them, then the taxpayers of the United States must indirectly meet them. I am wondering if it is proposed to premiumize the cancelation of the larger portion of these obligations, called war debts, in order to provide another method by which the funds necessary to pay the bonus may be secured?

I do not believe that a subject of this importance should be acted upon without full measure of consideration by a standing committee of the Senate. To say, as this amendment appears to say—an amendment which few, if any, Senators had read when it was submitted to the Senate—that if we can just be sure to get enough money from our foreign debtors with which to pay the adjusted-compensation certificates, the remainder of the debts may be wiped out if at this particular time a better arrangement cannot be made, I think would be rank folly, and I register my protest against it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, let me suggest to other Senators who may not have had an opportunity to analyze this amendment that if the Senator from Arkansas had had such an opportunity he would not have made the statement which has just fallen from his lips. This amendment vests in the President entire authority to readjust the debts, and I am assuming that the President would drive a fairly good bargain, in the light of all the circumstances.

If the Senator will note section 203, it is there provided how payment of the balance of the debts may be provided for. It authorizes the President to accept securities of the other governments, or other acceptable securities, guaranteed credits of the central banks of the debtor countries, and it also contains the provision that the President may stipulate that such countries in time of war shall supply the United States with munitions, equipment, arms, and vessels, at a price not to exceed the cost of the supplies furnished.

The Senator's conclusion that this amendment contemplates a limitation of the payments to an amount adequate and only adequate to discharge the adjusted-service certificates is not warranted by the text of the amendment, and certainly was not in my contemplation when I offered it. Every safeguard is provided to enable the President to make the best bargain possible that would conclude this vexatious matter and give us an opportunity to reembark on the highway of recovery.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Oklahoma, let it be said that I did not assert that the President would be under obligation to accept any definite sum. The implication of the amendment is that he shall make the best bargain that he can and bring the subject of the war debts to a conclusion.

There is an existing statute which forbids the Executive to enter into any arrangement or to make any adjustment concerning war debts without the consent of Congress.

I have no doubt that if the obligation should be imposed upon the President or if the authority should be granted him he would do the best that could be done; but before passing legislation of this character, there should be thought and consideration given to its terms. It is not a subject that can be determined in a few moments. It is a matter of very great importance. I do not think I care to submit anything further, and I yield the floor to the Senator from Illinois unless he wishes to address a question to me.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I reply to the query of the Senator. I do not wish to address a query to the able leader from Arkansas but simply to make some observations for the consideration of the Senate and of the Senator from Oklahoma. As the Senator from Arkansas has pointed out, we have a statute which practically forbids the form of adjustment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma, which calls for payment and denies the right of any arrangement other than payment.

I also call the attention of the able Senator from Oklahoma to the fact that should an arrangement be made by any source whatever that looked to payment to this country by a foreign country in the form of ammunition necessary to supply us in time of war, we would place ourselves at the mercy of a foreign country which might at the time of conflict be an ally of the very nation assailing us. But more sad is it to contemplate that the time shall ever come when in a conflict we must depend upon some other country, to wit, a foreign country, to provide us the means necessary to our defense. It would lead us where we would have such complaints by us against such foreign country for failure to comply on time and of quantity necessary and would otherwise so involve us that, instead of aiding us in war, it would multiply toward dangerous conditions and desperate situations beyond our capacity to describe.

The eminent Senator will realize that one of the methods suggested by his well-meant amendment would carry this country into a conflict beyond the calculations of the Senate either to anticipate its serious results or in any wise to control its operations or fatal consequences.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The provision referred to by the Senator from Illinois illustrates the point that I attempted to make a few moments ago, namely, that legislation of this character and importance ought to be studied by a committee; but there is another provision which should be noted.

I point out now that subparagraph (a) on page 3 declares:

> (a) By the delivery of bonds of such government, or other acceptable securities, to the United States, which bonds shall not be sold or disposed by the United States except when the United States is in a state of war as the result of a formal declaration by Congress.

I do not know what implication would be given to other governments and peoples by the adoption of language of that character. It apparently puts the United States into the position of seeking to make readjustment of the war debts with a view of preparing for some international conflict. I am sure that was not in the mind of the Senator who prepared and offered the amendment, but in addition to what the Senator from Illinois has pointed out, it does carry an implication that I think the Congress should avoid in its legislation.

This is a rather difficult time; international relations between many governments and peoples are strained almost to the breaking point, and now for the Congress to say that it will take bonds from the debtor nations and that such bonds shall never be sold except while we are in war and may be used for the purpose of trading for ammunition and munitions, I think is calculated to disturb the peace.

Mr. GORE rose.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly. The Senator from Illinois gladly yields to the Senator from Louisiana, as he has to the Senator from Arkansas and will to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] if he so desires.

Mr. LONG. I wish to say to my friends from Illinois and Arkansas that my understanding is that the friends of the bonus are opposed to this amendment being tacked onto this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not know by what authority the Senator from Louisiana represents the friends of the bonus or speaks for them, but I felt it my duty to point out the considerations I have expressed.

Mr. LONG. The only authority I have is that the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Missouri have indicated to me that they did not want to confuse this bill with anything else.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if I may conclude my observations——

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to state my position. I am opposed to the bonus issue being beclouded or entangled with any other issue, either the issue of printing-press money or the issue of foreign debts or any other extraneous or controversial question.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I shall conclude unless the Senator from Oklahoma desires to interrupt me. I will yield to him if he does.

Mr. GORE. I do not care to interrupt.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I wish to add a further suggestion, which I trust may not be misunderstood beyond its exact phrase and exact utterance. I have seen, so far as I am concerned, apart from the suggestions and reason for opposition I have already expressed, that in this amendment we would become dependent upon foreign countries for munitions and instrumentalities in the event we should become involved in war. I am compelled to hark back to the fact that foreign governments which have failed to pay us the money they owe us and have gone so far as even to refuse to acknowledge the obligations and then have refrained from making any payment of any kind whatsoever upon them. As matters of the world exist, to use the words of the Senator from Arkansas, the nations are in a taut and drawn state all over the world.

For this reason and other reasons stated by me it is a matter of mere self-preservation of our Nation. Therefore in a moment of such turmoil and confusion as would be afflicted upon us by war we should express our independence. Our position must remain one of demanding of debtors payment of our debts due, stand on our proven national honor as we demand America shall remain American.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment at this time on account of the parliamentary turn the situation has taken. I should like for it to receive further consideration. I am satisfied if Senators understood it they would take a more favorable view toward it, because it would extricate us from a dilemma from which I am unable to conceive any other easy means of escape, a dilemma from which it is desired, from our own standpoint and from the standpoint of other nations concerned, that some sort of honorable way should be found to extricate us and to extricate other nations.

Of course, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] speaks correctly when he says the House offered an amendment to the moratorium bill, which became a law, that no further cancelation of debts should be made. That is entirely true, but that did not bind the hands of this Congress. If this measure should pass with my amendment incorporated in it it would supersede that measure, and that measure then would have no effect.

The point made by the Senator from Illinois that we ought not to rely in any measure upon securing munitions from other countries in time of war, in the hour of need or peril, certainly has no foundation either in fact or in history. During the recent World War, prior to the entry of the United States into that conflict, the leading powers purchased munitions from the United States—billions and multiplied billions. Is there any reason why they should not have done so? Certainly at that time there was no reason why we should not have made the sale under the then existing law. For a belligerent power to purchase munitions from a neutral in time of war has a thousand precedents. There is nothing in international law, in history, or in common sense to militate against such purchase.

So far as the further comments of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are concerned, that these securities were to be disposed of in time of war and only in time of war, the three alternatives I mentioned a few moments ago each contain that provision, that they shall be availed of in time of war. It is not a new thing under the sun. It is not unprecedented. It has the sanction of precedent and of experience for nations to build up a sort of war chest in time of peace to be availed of in time of war. My idea is that this could be constituted into a sort of a war chest, a floating credit or a floating reserve, to be availed of in time of war, in time of exigency, when time should be the essence of security; that it could then be availed of.

Even those provisions are not mandatory upon the President. They are only permissive and suggestive. He need not resort to any of those measures with relation to the balance of the payment due after the acceptance of enough cash to make payment of the adjusted-service certificates. I have no doubt the President, if vested with this power, would make wise and judicious use of it, if he made use of it at all.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. President, I desire to express my emphatic dissent from some of the views expressed by my distinguished colleague the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] upon this important question. I also wish to express my emphatic opposition to any such action as he proposes on the part of the Senate.

He speaks of the United States as being in a dilemma with respect to the foreign debts. I cannot see where we are in any dilemma as to those debts. He talks about extricating us from our dilemma. What he proposes will extricate our debtors from their dilemma. I am opposed to extricating them by cancelation of the debts, which they justly owe to this Government for help rendered to them in a time of national peril, help which brought to them the salvation of their very existence as nations.

It is my purpose, at some future date, to address the Senate upon the question of these foreign debts.

The amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma implies the entering into new agreements by the President of the United States with the defaulting nations. What assurance, if we made another agreement with them, have we that they would keep it so long as they have repudiated the most sacred obligation which they could possibly have incurred by the execution of agreements with the United States to repay the loans made to them—loans reduced with extraordinary generosity by the United States? We have no assurance whatever that they would keep any other agreements they might make with us.

In this connection I wish to say that the fact that they owe us these debts, which they are not paying, is not congesting the arteries of international trade as suggested by my able colleague [Mr. GORE]. It is not affecting our international trade except insofar as our debtors may be using that fact to boycott, in a sense, commerce with the United States.

For my part, I believe these debts will yet be paid if we continue to maintain the position of self-respect and dignity which has thus far characterized our attitude.

We made compromise settlements, much to the advantage of the debtor nations. They have repudiated these compromises. I would consider it a humiliation to go to them as supplicants for a partial payment of their debts upon the theory that, in that and in no other way, can this Nation pay a debt which it owes to its own soldiers. Our soldiers gave their lives and their blood to help save these foreign nations from defeat during the World War and we should pay the debt we owe them, regardless of what other nations may do about their indebtedness to us.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the able Senator from California, formerly an eminent Secretary of the Treasury, give me information with respect to his purpose to address the Senate fully upon the payment of the foreign debts? May I ask that at the same time he will take occasion to discuss both the former presence and the present absence of securities which were heretofore held as security for those debts and which have been transferred from their places?

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I may say in answer to my distinguished colleague from Illinois that I hope his question does not imply that any such securities were transferred during my term as Secretary of the Treasury.

In the settlement of the foreign debts by the War Debt Refunding Commission it may be that the securities to which I think the Senator alludes—though he has not given any desecription of them—were released in the general settlement which was made with one of our debtors, whether by authority of Congress or otherwise I do not know.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As a result of, and according to, the debt-settlement agreements there should have been deposited in the Treasury certain bonds of various denominations of the respective debtor countries. According to agreement those countries bound themselves to refund them with new issues which could be sold to the general public, whenever they were requested by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States so to do. In view of the question of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], which the Senator from California answered, does the Senator mean to imply that those securities, which were in the Treasury when he left the Treasury, have been removed and new issues have not been substituted according to agreement?

Mr. McADOO. I will say to the able Senator from Minnesota that my remarks carry no such implication.

I can only repeat what I said in answer to the question of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], that as I recall the facts, without having recently examined them, the Treasury held collateral security for the payment of a certain portion of the debt of one of the great powers to this country. When the debt settlement was effected with that power under the Harding administration, those securities were surrendered, and the general obligations of that government were taken in lieu thereof. I do not know whether or not there was express authority for that particular phase of the settlement; but I am looking into it, and when I am ready to speak on the subject of foreign debts I shall be glad to disclose the facts which I may discover.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. McADOO. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Assuming that new securities were deposited in the Treasury in lieu of the former ones, does not the Senator think it would be well, if we could get no other settlement, that the Treasury ask the debtor governments to give us, in exchange for what we have, new securities in such denominations as could be sold on the various money markets of the world?

Mr. McADOO. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that that should be done, and should have been done long since; but I understand that no demand has ever been made upon any one of our debtors for the issuance to the Treasury of bonds or securities in such denominations and of such character as we are entitled to demand under the debt-settlement agreements.

On the question of munitions and supplies as proposed in the Gore amendment, if we should enter into any such agreement with any of the powers, and we subsequently became involved in war, I think the contracting power would find itself in the position of a belligerent in short order if it attempted to supply arms and munitions under such an agreement. It would be wholly incompatible with neutrality, because it would be helping us to prosecute the war, even though it were done in pursuance of an agreement of that character. My distinguished colleague from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is entirely right in saying that this is too important a matter to be grafted as an amendment on this bill. It should be studied carefully and thoroughly before it is acted upon by the Senate. I sincerely hope that the amendment may be rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the dilemma to which I referred, the dilemma which I had in mind, was with reference to our international commerce, international trade. I am firm in the conviction that we shall have to trade our way out of this trouble. I do not think there is any other way out.

In 1929 world trade aggregated $37,000,000,000. In 1932 it had dropped down to $12,000,000,000, and I have recently seen the statement that in 1934 only 1 nation increased its imports materially and only 1 nation increased its exports materially.

These debtor nations can pay the United States only in gold or in goods. They have not the gold. We will not accept their goods. The question of making transfers stands as an insuperable bar. So it is contended—and there is some force in the contention—that the liquidation of these debts by the alternative provided for in section 203 would permit the delivery of goods—of arms and munitions—direct to the Government, and would not call for foreign exchange. The payments could be made without encountering the obstruction which now arrests trade between this country and the debtor countries.

The Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] says he believes the debtors will pay these debts. I admire his optimism, but I do not share it. I have no doubt the Senator from California believes in the fairies—I do not. I have no doubt he believes in Santa Claus. There is as much justification for the one faith as for the other. It seems to me no reasonable man can conclude, in the light of recent experience, that the debts will ever be paid in full. They were not even mentioned in the recent British budget, although that budget showed a surplus instead of a deficit.

The Senator from California asks, and asks with a considerable air of triumph, if this plan should be adopted and executed, what assurance we would have that the debtor nations would make payment under the new arrangement with any better faith or punctuality than they have made payments under the existing arrangement. I do not say they would make payment with any better faith or any greater scruple than they do now. I do not know that they would. But even if we had no better assurance upon that point, we would at least have more cash if this plan were carried out. We would have $1,700,000,000 more in available cash. That amount is not to be despised even in these days of multibillions. We could at least wait for the balance with quite as much complacence after having realized $1,700,000,000.

Senators may continue to appeal to prejudice and to cultivate prejudice by insisting that the debtor nations ought to discharge their duty. Of course they ought. The debtor nations ought to pay their debts. Of course they ought. If the refusal and the failure to pay injured them alone, I should say let them wrestle with the consequences. The trouble is the present situation injures us, and we are courting the injury rather than providing a rational way out of this distressing situation.

I agree that when these debts were first contracted, when the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] was Secretary of the Treasury, I thought then, and I think now, that we ought to have accepted the securities of those countries identical in form and terms and denominations with the securities which they were issuing and floating at that time, so that these securities would have passed into trade, would have been absorbed by speculators and by investors, and would have been issued in such form that they could not be distinguished from other bonds and other securities issued at the time. Had that been done, we should not today have been in this dilemma, and should not have been obliged to draw an overdraft upon the credulity of the Senator from California.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, the agreement entered into with France for the settlement of her war debt to the United States, wherein it is shown that on the request of the United States that Government, like other governments, agreed to issue in exchange for the securities we now hold certificates that should be sold to the general public and on the money markets of the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONNALLY in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AGREEMENT FOR THE FUNDING OF THE INDEBTEDNESS OF FRANCE TO THE UNITED STATES

Agreement made the 29th day of April 1926, at the city of Washington, District of Columbia, between the French Republic, hereinafter called France, party of the first part, and the United States of America, hereinafter called the United States, party of the second part

Whereas, France is indebted to the United States as of June 15, 1925, upon obligations in the aggregate principal amount of $3,340,516,043.72, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon; and

Whereas, France desires to fund said indebtedness to the United States, both principal and interest, through the issue of bonds to the United States, and the United States is prepared to accept bonds from France upon the terms hereinafter set forth;

Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of the mutual covenants herein contained, it is agreed as follows:

1. Amount of indebtedness: The amount of indebtedness to be funded, after allowing for certain cash payments made or to be made by France is $4,025,000,000, which has been computed as follows:

Principal of obligations held for cash advanced under Liberty bond acts	$2,933,405,070.15
Accrued and unpaid interest at 4¼ percent to Dec. 15, 1922	445,066,027.49
		$3,378,471,097.64
Principal of obligations given for surplus war supplies purchased on credit	407,341,145.01
Interest at 4¼ percent from the last interest-payment date prior to Dec. 15, 1922, to Dec. 15, 1922	6,324,940.79
		413,666,085.80
Total indebtedness as of Dec. 15, 1922		3,792,137,183.44
Accrued and unpaid interest at 3 percent per annum on this amount from Dec. 15, 1922, to June 15, 1925		284,410,288.75
Total indebtedness as of June 15, 1925		4,076,547,472.19
Credits:
Payments received on account of interest between Dec. 15, 1922, and June 15, 1925	$50,917,643.13
Payments on account of principal since Dec. 15, 1922	230,171.44
Interest on principal payments at 3 percent per annum from date of payment to June 15, 1925	12,970.73
		$51,160,785.30
Net indebtedness as of June 15, 1925		4,025,386,686.89
To be paid in cash upon execution of agreement		386,686.89
Total indebtedness to be funded into bonds		4,025,000,000.00

2. Payment: In order to provide for the payment of the indebtedness thus to be funded, France will issue to the United States at par, bonds of France in the aggregate principal amount of $4,025,000,000, dated June 15, 1925, and maturing serially on the several dates and in the amounts fixed in the following schedule:

June 15:
1926	$30,000,000.00
1927	30,000,000.00
1928	32,500,000.00
1929	32,500,000.00
1930	35,000,000.00
1931	1,350,000.00
1932	11,363,500.00
1933	21,477,135.00
1934	36,691,906.35
1935	42,058,825.41
1936	52,479,413.67
1937	63,004,207.80
1938	68,634,249.88
1939	74,320,592.38
1940	80,063,798.30
1941	51,728,872.58
1942	57,763,450.02
1943	58,918,719.03

Provided, however, That France, at its option, upon not less than 90 days' advance notice to the United States, may postpone so much of any payment on account of principal and/or interest falling due in any one year as hereinabove provided after June 15, 1926, and prior to June 16, 1932, as shall be in excess of $20,000,000 in any one year, to any subsequent June 15 or December 15 not more than 3 years distant from its due date, and upon like notice France, at its option, may postpone any payment on account of principal falling due as hereinafter provided after June 15, 1932, to any subsequent June 15 or December 15 not more than 3 years distant from its due date; but any such postponement shall be only on condition that in case France shall at any time exercise this option as to any payment of principal and/or interest, the payment falling due in the third succeeding year cannot be postponed at all unless and until the payment of principal and/or interest due 3 years, 2 years, and 1 year previous thereto shall actually have been made. All such postponed payments shall bear interest at the rate of 4¼ percent per annum, payable semiannually.

3. Form of bond: All bonds issued or to be issued hereunder to the United States shall be payable to the Government of the United States of America or order, and shall be signed for France by its Ambassador at Washington or by its other duly authorized representative. The bonds shall be substantially in the form set forth in the exhibit hereto annexed and marked "Exhibit A", and shall be issued in 62 pieces, with maturities and in denominations as hereinabove set forth, and shall bear no interest until June 15, 1930, and thereafter shall bear interest at the rate of 1 percent per annum from June 15, 1930, to June 15, 1940; at the rate of 2 percent per annum from June 15, 1940, to June 15, 1950; at the rate of 2½ percent per annum from June 15, 1950, to June 15, 1958; at the rate of 3 percent per annum from June 15, 1958, to June 15, 1965; and at the rate of 3½ percent per annum after June 15, 1965, all payable semiannually on June 15 and December 15 of each year.

4. Method of payment: All bonds issued or to be issued hereunder shall be payable, as to both principal and interest, in United States gold coin of the present standard of value, or, at the option of France, upon not less than 30 days' advance notice to the United States, in any obligations of the United States issued after April 6, 1917, to be taken at par and accrued interest to the date of payment hereunder.

All payments, whether in cash or in obligations of the United States, to be made by France on account of the principal of or interest on any bonds issued or to be issued hereunder and held by the United States shall be made at the Treasury of the United States in Washington, or, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and if in cash shall be made in funds immediately available on the date of payment, or if in obligations of the United States shall be in form acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States under the general regulations of the Treasury Department governing transactions in United States obligations.

5. Exemption from taxation: The principal and interest of all bonds issued or to be issued hereunder shall be paid without deduction for, and shall be exempt from, any and all taxes or other public dues, present or future, imposed by or under authority of France or any political or local taxing authority within France, whenever, so long as, and to the extent that beneficial ownership is in (a) the Government of the United States, (b) a person, firm, or association neither domiciled nor ordinarily resident in France, or (c) a corporation not organized under the laws of France.

6. Payments before maturity: France, at its option, on June 15 or December 15 of any year, upon not less than 90 days' advance notice to the United States, may make advance payments in amounts of $1,000 or multiples thereof, on account of the principal of any bond issued or to be issued hereunder and held by the United States. Any such advance payments shall be applied to the principal of such bonds as may be indicated by France at the time of the payment.

7. Exchange for marketable obligations: France will issue to the United States at any time, or from time to time, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in exchange for any or all of the bonds issued hereunder and held by the United States, definitive engraved bonds in form suitable for sale to the public, in such amounts and denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States may request, in bearer form, with provision for registration as to principal and/or in fully registered form, and otherwise on the same terms and conditions, as to dates of issue and maturity, rate or rates of interest, if any, exemption from taxation, payment in obligations of the United States issued after April 6, 1917, and the like, as the bonds surrendered on such exchange. France will deliver definitive engraved bonds to the United States in accordance herewith within 6 months of receiving notice of any such request from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and pending the delivery of the definitive engraved bonds will deliver, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, temporary bonds or interim receipts in form satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States within 30 days of the receipt of such request, all without expense to the United States. The United States, before offering any such bonds or interim receipts for sale in France, will first offer them to France for purchase at par and accrued interest, if any, and France shall likewise have the option, in lieu of issuing any such bonds or interim receipts, to make advance redemption at par and accrued interest, if any, of a corresponding principal amount of bonds issued hereunder and held by the United States. France agrees that the definitive engraved bonds called for by this paragraph shall contain all such provisions, and that it will cause to be promulgated all such rules, regulations, and orders as shall be deemed necessary or desirable by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in order to facilitate the sale of the bonds in the United States, in France, or elsewhere, and that if requested by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, it will use its good offices to secure the listing of the bonds on such stock exchanges as the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States may specify.

8. Cancelation and surrender of obligations: Upon the execution of this agreement, the delivery to the United States of the principal amount of bonds of France to be issued hereunder, together with satisfactory evidence of authority for the execution of this agreement by the representative of France and for the execution of the bonds to be issued hereunder, the United States will cancel and surrender to France at the Treasury of the United States in Washington, the obligations of France held by the United States.

9. Notices: Any notice, request, or consent under the hand of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, shall be deemed and taken as the notice, request, or consent of the United States, and shall be sufficient if delivered at the Embassy of France at Washington or at the Office of the Ministry of Finance at Paris; and any notice, request, or election from or by France shall be sufficient if delivered to the American Embassy at Paris or to the Secretary of the Treasury at the Treasury of the United States in Washington. The United States in its discretion may waive any notice required hereunder, but any of such waiver shall be in writing and shall not extend to or affect any subsequent notice or impair any right of the United States to require notice hereunder.

10. Compliance with legal requirements: France represents and agrees that the execution and delivery of this agreement have in all respects been duly authorized and that all acts, conditions, and legal formalities which should have been completed prior to the making of this agreement have been completed as required by the laws of France and in conformity therewith.

11. Counterparts: This agreement shall be executed in two counterparts, each of which shall have the force and effect of an original.

In witness whereof France has caused this agreement to be executed on its behalf by Hon. Henry Bérenger, its Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary at Washington, thereunto duly authorized, subject, however, to ratification in France, and the United States has likewise caused this agreement to be executed on its behalf by the Secretary of the Treasury as Chairman of the World War Foreign Debt Commission, with the approval of the President, subject, however, to the approval of Congress, pursuant to the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, as amended by the act of Congress approved February 28, 1923, and as further amended by the act of Congress approved January 21, 1925, all on the day and year first above written.

THE FRENCH REPUBLIC,
By HENRY BÉRENGER,
THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
For the World War Foreign Debt Commission:
By ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury and Chairman of the Commission.

Approved:
CALVIN COOLIDGE,
President.

(Form of bond)

THE REPUBLIC OF FRANCE

$———— No. ————

The Republic of France, hereinafter called France, for value received, promises to pay to the Government of the United States of America, hereinafter called the United States, or order, on June 15, 19—, the sum of $————, and to pay interest upon said principal sum after June 15, 1930, at the rate of 1 percent per annum from June 15, 1930, to June 15, 1940, at the rate of 2 percent per annum from June 15, 1940, to June 15, 1950, at the rate of 2½ percent per annum from June 15, 1950, to June 15, 1958, at the rate of 3 percent per annum from June 15, 1958, to June 15, 1965, and at the rate of 3½ percent per annum after June 15, 1965, all payable semiannually on the 15th day of December and June in each year. This bond is payable as to both principal and interest in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of value, or, at the option of France, upon not less than 30 days' advance notice to the United States, in any obligations of the United States issued after April 6, 1917, to be taken at par and accrued interest to the date of payment hereunder.

This bond is payable as to both principal and interest without deduction for, and is exempt from, any and all taxes and other public dues, present or future, imposed by or under authority of France or any political or local taxing authority within France, whenever, so long as, and to the extent that, beneficial ownership is in (a) the Government of the United States, (b) a person, firm, or association neither domiciled nor ordinarily resident in France, or (c) a corporation not organized under the laws of France. This bond is payable as to both principal and interest at the Treasury of the United States in Washington, D. C., or at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

This bond is issued pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 2 of an agreement dated April 29, 1926, between France and the United States, to which agreement this bond is subject and to which reference is hereby made.

In witness whereof, France has caused this bond to be executed in its behalf by its Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary at Washington, thereunto duly authorized, as of June 15, 1925.

THE FRENCH REPUBLIC:
By
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], as amended, in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], as amended, in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment. I send it to the desk and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the amendment of Mr. CLARK, as amended, on page 3, line 10, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma and the following:

(4) That the holder of an adjusted-service certificate may, upon his request, in lieu of obtaining the cash payment of his certificate as herein provided, allow said certificate to be continued for such period as he may desire; and in such event the holder of the certificate shall be paid interest in quarterly, semiannual, or annual payments at the rate of 3 percent per annum on the balance due on the face value of the certificate, said interest to be payable on and from July 1, 1935.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, very briefly, this amendment provides that in the event a veteran prefers to continue his certificate he may do so, and draw interest at the rate of 3 percent per annum thereon. That is the substance of it.

A great many veterans have said they did not care to have the cash on their certificates, and doubtless there are some of whom that is true. In that event, if they wish to keep the certificate alive, we can pay them 3 percent interest on it. In this way we might obviate the necessity for raising at least a few hundred million dollars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], as amended, in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives insisting upon its disagreement to all Senate amendments, except Senate amendments nos. 8, 58, and 60 to the bill (H. R. 6718) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes; insisting upon its amendment to Senate amendment no. 29 to the bill, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. RUSSELL. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments still in disagreement, disagree to the House amendment to Senate amendment no. 29, agree to the further conference requested by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Georgia inform the Chair whether the Senators whose names are handed to the Chair are in sympathy with the attitude of the Senate?

Mr. RUSSELL. The names handed to the Chair represent the members of the conference committee heretofore appointed on the conference which already has been held on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. SMITH, Mr. KEYES, and Mr. NYE conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3896) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, for controlled expansion of the currency, and to extend the time for filing applications for benefits under the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the pending amendment, I desire to state that I intend to support the measure reported by the Finance Committee of the Senate, and, therefore, I shall vote against the pending amendment. My reasons for thus voting are the same as those so ably stated by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I am convinced that the only opportunity for a soldiers' bonus being paid this year is through the adoption of the Harrison bill.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I assume, from appearances, that a vote shortly will be had upon the pending substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] for the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee.

Senators will remember that the compensation certificates were created by the act of 1924. That enactment was made before a great many of us had been privileged to come into this body. It authorized the issuance of the certificates; it recognized an obligation upon the part of the United States to the veterans of the war under a formula which was provided in the act. The certificates were issued; the veterans accepted those certificates; and for a time it was thought that the question of adjusted compensation was adequately disposed of.

As the years have passed, it has developed that a great body of the veterans are not satisfied with the certificates which mature January 1, 1945, and everybody knows that in the country at large and in Congress there has been an issue that has recurred time and again. I think the Senate has voted five times on some variation of the provisions of the so-called "Patman bill." Finally it has come to be thought that this issue ought to be settled; that a disposition ought to be made of the question; for otherwise it will recur in every session of the Congress and will constantly be before the American people for solution. I am one of those who believe that the issue ought to be settled and ought to be settled now. I rise at this time to make one or two short observations with respect to the two propositions which are immediately before the Senate.

Mr. President, I was one of those who had not attained a seat in this body when the enactment was made which authorized these certificates. I was one of those who at that time stood upon the outside, and observed what the Congress was doing. I am one who now believes that the certificates ought to be paid without awaiting maturity in 1945.

There was no reason, except the reason of convenience in Government finance, why the certificates ever should have been issued in the first place. If the obligation, which I did not help create or recognize, the obligation which the Congress recognized by a two-thirds vote in both the bodies of the Congress, was a just and proper obligation against our Government, it might very well have been paid in cash at that time. Governmental obligations to the railroads were paid in cash.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. In just a minute. Our obligations to the war contractors were paid in cash. Our obligations to all having claims against our Government, either legal or moral, were paid in cash, save only this obligation, recognized in the World War Adjusted Compensation Act.

I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. It was the statement the Senator made that it would have been better to have paid the bonus in 1924, when the act was passed, that prompted me to rise, because the impression is abroad in the country as the Senator realizes, and it is abroad because of an educational campaign that has been conducted in every nook and corner, that these certificates are now due.

Under the bill recommended by the Finance Committee, if the amount of the cash payment that was agreed upon in 1924, on the basis of a dollar a day for service at home and $1.25 a day for foreign service, aggregating about $400, on the average to the soldiers, were taken and compound interest figured from January 1, 1925, at 4 percent——

Mr. STEIWER. Why at 4 percent?

Mr. HARRISON. Under the bill recommended by the Finance Committee the soldiers would receive more money than they would have received if they had obtained the payment of the bonus at that time.

Mr. STEIWER. Why should the interest be calculated at 4 percent?

Mr. HARRISON. Because I am trying to go the most reasonable length possible.

Mr. STEIWER. If income-tax payers of this country overpaid their income taxes, there was a period of many years when the money was refunded to them with 6-percent interest. Why always discriminate against the veterans in the matter of calculating interest rates?

Mr. HARRISON. The representatives of the ex-service men's organizations, during the consideration of the bill in 1922, requested only 4½ percent, and in 1924 the bill carried 4 percent. There never was a request for 6 percent, and I ask the Senator now whether he thinks that we ought to pay 6-percent interest, compounded annually?

Mr. STEIWER. No; I merely asked the question in order to make the distinction between the two classes of creditors.

Mr. HARRISON. That shows how ridiculous the Senator's position is.

Mr. STEIWER. I think it is not ridiculous to urge that 5 percent ought to be adopted as the interest rate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Mississippi, or does anyone else know why the going rate of interest should not be applied to this question? As the Senator from Oregon has well said, on tax delinquencies the Government has charged 6 percent. From many individuals in the United States and many corporations who failed to pay the full amount of their income taxes as finally determined, the Government exacted a rate of 6 percent. In the case of tax refunds, where the Government had overcharged a taxpayer, whether an individual or a corporation, the Government recognized the rate of 6 percent as the going rate of interest, and paid that rate of interest. Why should the distinction be made between payments to others and payments to the veterans in the matter of the going rate of interest as established by the Government itself?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, let me elaborate that a little further. When the Government has loaned money on the adjusted-compensation certificates, under the original provision of the act it charged the veteran 4½ percent, but under the philosophy of the Senator from Mississippi he would compound this interest in favor of the veteran at 4 percent.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that I was one of those who voted to override the President's veto when the act was passed. I was one of those who stood here and fought and voted for an optional cash bonus proposition, and the amount was $400. That is what we stood for. If the Senator will take 6 percent, his own figure, and compound it for the time since 1925, when the certificates were issued, he will find that the veterans would not, even so, get as much as they would receive under the Finance Committee's recommendation. Why take the Senator's figure of 6 percent under those circumstances?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, let us analyze that figure in the light of what I believe should be substantial justice and equity as between the Government and the soldier.

Let me say again, I was not in the Congress when the obligation was created. I think the question before the Senate now is not whether the act should have been passed, nor is it whether the obligation should have been admitted. The obligation is here, and we are dealing with a condition and not a theory. Assuming that the obligation is a just and proper obligation from the Government to the veteran, the real questions we should ask are: In what amount should it be paid, and at what time should it be paid?

The statement made by the Senator from Mississippi is entirely correct, if we let this credit stand just as it is and just as it was calculated in the first place. The American Legion, however, takes a position in which I concur, namely, that the $60 bonus paid to the veterans at the time of discharge should never have been subtracted from the adjusted-compensation credit. We know how that bonus came to be paid. We know that when the veteran went into the Army his clothing was taken away from him.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. With all due respect to the Senator from Oregon, with whom I agree on many things, I do think he uses a misnomer when he speaks of the $60 given to the soldier when he was discharged from the Army as a "bonus." It was not a bonus at all. It was more or less of a clothing allowance. As I happened to know from my own experience, and I dare say the Senator from Oregon knows from his, not referring to my own personal case, but to the men with whom I was associated in the Army, the $60 was an amount barely sufficient to enable a man to buy a very cheap suit of civilian clothes to replace those which had been taken from him when he went into the Army, and to subsist him for just 2 or 3 days, until he was returned to civilian life.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator from Missouri is right, as he usually is, and I am glad to stand corrected. I ought not to have called the $60 allowance a "bonus", though it had been so designated and referred to in very many quarters for a long time.

Mr. CLARK. It should be designated a clothing allowance and a subsistence allowance for 2 days.

Mr. STEIWER. I agree with the Senator thoroughly. And it ought not to have been subtracted from the adjusted-compensation credit. If we restore that $60 to the credit and then figure the compounded interest rate at 5 percent, not at 6 percent, we will find that the veteran at this time is entitled to receive practically as much as the face of his certificate. The Vinson bill provides payment of the face of the certificate. The Finance Committee amendment provides much less.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of asking him a question?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Speaking of this $60, of course the first time that was heard of was quite recently, and it emanated from the very ingenious and very smart mind of our friend from Texas, Mr. PATMAN, to whom I pay respect and tribute. But in 1924, when we were busily engaged here in trying to work out the adjusted-service-certificate question and obtain the views of the representatives of the ex-service organizations, the $60 was never proposed, was never heard of in the whole discussion, and the adjusted-service certificates were based on no such consideration at all.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I think that has but little to do with it.

Mr. HARRISON. It has $60 to do with it.

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; it does. It has $60 to do with it in terms of inequity for the veterans. But I think otherwise it has but little to do with our consideration of this question at this time.

It would appear to me that a mistake was made at that time with respect to this $60, and now is our opportunity to correct it if we want to deal with this matter equitably.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STEIWER. I will yield in a moment, Mr. President. I desire to develop a little further the thought I am trying to present to the Senate at this moment. The committee amendment, I know, is a well-intended effort upon the part of those who were responsible for bringing it to the Senate floor, but that amendment does not pay to the veteran the amount which the country thinks the veteran is entitled to receive, nor does it provide the veteran the amount which he thinks he is entitled to receive. It does not provide compensation adequately adjusted.

I am told in the case of a certificate for $1,000 where the veteran had borrowed $500, so that he thinks he is entitled now to receive a balance of $500, less the interest upon the $500 loan, that he would not get that amount under the committee proposal, but he would get something like $180 in payment. That is to say, he would have obtained his loan of $500, which is the maximum permitted under the law passed 4 years ago, and in addition to that loan he would now receive, under the committee amendment, something like $180, which he would be obliged to accept in full settlement of the admitted obligation.

I am unable to conclude that such a result constitutes a fair settlement, nor do I believe that the veterans of America will accept it, nor will it settle this question nor end this controversy. It leaves it wide open, and I feel we shall have it back here before 12 months in order finally to settle the question.

If it is the desire of the Congress now to deal equitably and fairly with the veteran on this question, and end the matter so we shall hear no more of payment of bonus, it will be necessary for us to do something other than to adopt the proposal brought up on the Senate floor by the Senate Finance Committee. Probably at no time in his life has the veteran needed his compensation as badly as he needs it now.

This brings me, Mr. President, to the conclusion which I desire to urge, namely that the safe, adequate, and just solution of this matter—indeed I might say the only generous solution—offering to the veteran a little more, it is true, than it was calculated in the formula, but nevertheless a just and generous provision which actually will settle this question, is for the Senate to agree to the proposal made here by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and adopt the so-called "Vinson bill" as a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think that the Senate would override a veto of the President on that proposition?

Mr. STEIWER. I hope so, Mr. President, but if the Senate did not override the veto it could always pass the committee's amendment. No one could oppose that very seriously.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that. But the ex-service men say this should be done quickly, and that many ex-service men need relief. The Senator knows the condition in the Senate, and he knows that the President is going to veto the so-called "Vinson bill" and the so-called "Patman bill" if either bill shall be passed by the Congress.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, with $4,800,000,000 relief funds subject to use, with Congress in session, and the matter entirely in our hands, let us not be too concerned about the distress which will come to the veteran in the next 3 or 4 or 6 weeks while we are dealing with this problem.

The fact of the matter is that the veterans, most of them, were discharged in the year 1919. They have waited now for 16 years for the settlement of this claim. They have waited for 16 years, Mr. President, and a few weeks longer is not going to hurt them seriously.

I desire to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that if he wants to do full justice to the veterans of the World War, let us vote the provision which we think is fair and which we can defend, and which does not take from the veteran that which he understands is his, and which has been officially recognized as his. Then, if there is a veto, and if we are not able to enact the bill, notwithstanding the veto of the President, we can always come back to the proposal which has been presented here by the Senate Finance Committee, and I take it we could pass it very promptly, and from what has been said it would not confront a veto. There is no great difficulty involved. Does the Senator think there is any great difficulty involved in that situation?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; but I am asking the Senator from Mississippi a question, and I yield first for an answer.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is a very practical Senator. He would prefer, then, as I understand, to go back to Oregon to the ex-service men with nothing, by voting for the Vinson bill, rather than to vote for the bill recommended by the Finance Committee, which would receive the President's approval and which would put the matter behind him.

Mr. STEIWER. I would prefer to vote for what I regard as just treatment for my comrades, the veterans of the World War.

Mr. HARRISON. Even though it could get nowhere for practical purposes?

Mr. STEIWER. And if I should find that it got nowhere I could then bring myself, though very reluctantly, to support the committee amendment. We can do it all in this session of Congress. None of us is going to be obliged to go home to face his constituents with this thing on our conscience. We will have it all settled. There is not any trouble about that. So let us attempt now to settle it right.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me say to the Senator that this proposition is before the Senate now. No one can tell whether it will be before the Senate again or not. Now is the time for us to act upon it. I have no fault to find with the Senator's position, nor with the position of any other Senator.

Mr. STEIWER. I do not find fault with the position of the Senator from Mississippi, except I think that the sound thing for courageous men to do is to stand for things which they think are right.

Mr. HARRISON. And get nothing.

Mr. STEIWER. No; to stand for that which they think is right, and then to determine their future course by the conditions which may develop. I hope the Vinson bill will be accepted. I hope that upon this vote the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] will be agreed to.

I yield the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi stated with great positiveness that the President would veto both the Patman bill and the Vinson bill. Is the Senator from Mississippi in a position to state with the same positiveness that the President will sign the bill as reported by the Finance Committee?

Mr. HARRISON. Of that I have not the slightest doubt in the world. Otherwise, I never should have offered this amendment in the Finance Committee.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, the Senator is just as positive of the one as he is of the other?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee bill, the so-called "Harrison amendment", which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 15, after line 6, it is proposed to insert a new subsection, as follows:

(j) In making any settlement under this act, the charge on account of interest on any loan shall not be at a rate in excess of 2 percent per annum, compounded annually after September 30, 1931.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, as I understand, what the Senator from Texas proposes is that after September 30, 1931, the interest on any loan granted by the Government to any ex-service man shall not be more than 2 percent. That will cost some $90,000,000; but I shall not oppose the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Mississippi for indicating his approval of the amendment; but I desire to submit a few remarks to the Senate, in order to place clearly before the Senate just what the amendment proposes to do.

Under the committee bill, which is the bill of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the computation of the amount of cash or bonds which will be paid to the veterans is based upon taking as of November 11, 1918, the date of the armistice, the basic credit in each case, either $1 a day for domestic service or $1.25 a day for foreign service. Upon those basic amounts the veteran is allowed interest at the rate of 4 percent, compounded annually up to the time he is paid the cash or the bonds. Under the bill of the Senator from Mississippi, no deduction whatever is made as to interest upon loans which the veterans may have paid. In other words, the entire interest which has accrued will be deducted from the amount which may be found to be due under the terms of the bill. In the so-called "Patman bill", which is the House bill, no interest was charged from October 1, 1931; under the Vinson bill no interest was charged from the 1st of October 1931, and all interest theretofore paid to the banks or others is refunded to the veteran, so that he has no interest charge whatever.

My amendment takes the date fixed in the Patman bill as of October 1, 1931, and reduces the amount of interest which will be charged the veteran to not exceeding 2 percent. In other words, the veteran will have been drawing on his compensation 4 percent, if he borrowed in the meantime, but he will only be paying the Government 2 percent.

The amendment takes away any just complaint that the veteran may make that he has had his adjusted-compensation certificate eaten up by interest, because he has had his money in the meantime, and upon it he will have paid only 2 percent in interest, while all during the time that he was paying 2 percent the Government will have been paying him 4 percent on the same money. One justification for that is that under the Harrison bill a premium is given to the soldier who keeps his certificate until 1945, because at that time a thousand-dollar certificate will be worth $1,125, instead of $1,000.

If it is just to offer the veteran who does not need the money, who does not have to borrow the money, who can retain his certificate until 1945, an added benefit under the Harrison bill, then why should not the one who was in need and who had to borrow be given the advantage of receiving the Government loan at a lower rate of interest than he otherwise would have to pay?

Mr. President, if the Harrison bill shall be adopted by the Senate, we have reasonable assurance that it will receive the Presidential approval and become a law. There is no Senator upon this floor who is more anxious than is the Senator from Texas that this vexatious question shall be settled by the Congress; but I am not in a position here to delude the soldier by making merely a gesture at him. I want to stand for legislation that will bring some concrete result to the soldier.

Since 1924 the Congress has been passing legislation with reference to the veterans' adjusted compensation which did not become law and could not become law. I shall not say that some of those gestures were made for any other reason than the reasons of sincerity and interest.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. If the same argument had been applied by Senators and Representatives at the time of the passage of the original adjusted-compensation act, namely, that a Presidential veto would defeat the legislation, there would never have been any adjusted-compensation legislation in the first place, would there?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know about that.

Mr. CLARK. Well, it was passed over the President's veto, was it not?

Mr. CONNALLY. One adjusted-compensation measure was passed over the veto; that is all.

Mr. CLARK. That is the one to which I am now referring.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that it is true that the act of 1924 was passed over the President's veto, but that does not mean that this bill would be passed over the President's veto.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment further?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. What I was suggesting was that, on the theory of the Senator from Texas, the Senators and Representatives should not have voted for the original adjusted-compensation act on the ground that they were deluding the soldiers and misleading them as to what they might have because the President had announced his intention at that time, as I recall, to veto the bill. So if the same rule which the Senator is now trying to invoke had been applied at that time, we never would have had an adjusted-compensation act in the first place.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Missouri may rationalize on that subject all he pleases, but, for my part, I prefer to support a measure which has some hope of success rather than to support on this floor a measure which we all know will not become a law. If the Senator from Missouri would like to go back to the veterans in Missouri and say to them, "Veteran, read my speech in the RECORD; look at what a noble effort I made to get your bonus certificate cashed; look at the roll call and see how I stood there in the first-line trenches and fought your battle", and then have the soldier ask him, "Well, Mr. Senator"——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield in just a moment. "Mr. Senator, I read your speech; it is a marvelous speech; it throbs and thrills with affection for the soldier; but, Mr. Senator, where is my money?" "Oh, well, I am sorry, Veteran; I was not President, and the President vetoed the bill, and we could not pass it over his veto." I am wondering if that veteran in Missouri might not propound to the Senator from Missouri the query, "Well, Mr. Senator, you had a chance to vote for a bill that the President would approve?" "Well, but I could not do that."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I say, in all fairness, I think the Senator from Texas is concerning himself unnecessarily as to the relationship between the Senator from Missouri and the veterans in the State of Missouri. Personally, I feel that I would be in much better case, so far as the veterans of Missouri are concerned—and I do not differentiate as between the veterans and any other citizens, for that matter—to go back and say to them that I voted for a complete payment, which would settle this matter, rather than for a bill which would not settle anything, whether signed by the President or not.

I will state further to the Senator from Texas that there is still a provision in the Constitution of the United States by which two-thirds of the Members of each House may pass a bill over the veto of the President.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Missouri the other day ridiculed the Senator from Texas for mentioning the Constitution in this Chamber. Now he brings it up as his refuge.

Mr. CLARK. I ridiculed the Senator from Texas for dragging out the Constitution at the particular time after ignoring it at other times, not that I myself, then or at any other time, ever had any disregard for the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me reply to the Senator from Missouri; then I will yield.

I am not concerned with the relations of the Senator from Missouri to his veteran constituents; I hope they are all for him; but I believe they would have better grounds for being for him, whether they are or not, if he would stand up here and fight for them in a cause that has some hope of triumph, rather than to lead a forlorn fight for a measure that he knows cannot ever become a law. In which case would he be the better friend of the veteran?

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I object very much to the Senator putting words in my mouth and thoughts in my mind.

Mr. CONNALLY. Nobody ever has to do that, for there are plenty there without any assistance. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. The Senator was insisting that this measure may never become a law, and I just suggested to the Senator a few moments ago that precisely the same argument which the Senator now makes was advanced against the original adjusted-compensation bill; and Senators stood on the floor and proclaimed against it on the ground that the President of the United States had the right to veto the measure. It so happened that the Congress of the United States was not able to see eye to eye with the President on that occasion. The Senator from Texas may have his own opinion as to what the view of the Congress would be in the event of a veto of this measure, but he certainly has no right to impute to me any such opinion.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to absolve myself from any apparent charge that I sought to put thoughts in the mind of the Senator from Missouri. When the Senator from Texas speaks on the floor he tries to express his own views.

Mr. CLARK. But the Senator said that I knew the bill could not possibly become a law, and I know no such thing.

Mr. CONNALLY. I never said that; I never assert——

Mr. CLARK. I will leave that to the RECORD.

Mr. CONNALLY. I never make any assertion as to what the Senator from Missouri knows or what he does not know. That is a mystery into which I never inject myself. All that the Senator from Texas means to say is that, according to his view, the Vinson bill cannot become a law at this session of Congress; and the Senator from Texas means to say that the Harrison bill can become a law if the Senate and the House shall pass it, as I hope they will. The Senator from Texas is now offering an amendment reducing the interest rate on the loans to veterans to 2 percent so that with one hand the bill will take from the soldier 2 percent and with the other hand will give to the soldier 4 percent on the same money. How can there be any just complaint that that is not doing substantial justice?

Let me say, Mr. President, that under the Harrison bill no soldier is required to accept its terms. If he prefers to keep his adjusted-compensation certificate now outstanding until 1945, he may do so. He has an option under the bill as reported by the committee. He has the option, first, to take cash. What cash? The $400 or $500 that would have been due in November 1918. With what? With 4 percent interest compounded from that date.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield in just a moment. The veteran has that option. If he does not want cash, he has the option of taking Government bonds, which are selling above par. Those bonds, when he receives them, may be cashed; they may be put in his strong box; they may be kept until maturity, and he may receive the interest on them; and if he does not want to exercise any of those options, as about 250,000 veterans have not exercised them in the past by borrowing, he may keep his certificate intact until 1945. I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator from Texas just made the statement that, under the provisions of the amendment reported by the committee, the veteran may keep his certificate until 1945. I believe that to be correct. I am not quarreling with the Senator as to his position. I believe, too, there are about 500,000 World War veterans who have not borrowed on their certificates. I assume a great many of those 500,000 might retain their certificates until 1945.

I ask the Senator from Texas what the relative position of those 500,000 veterans would be in comparison with the veteran who has borrowed, and who needs the money and is obliged to accept settlement at this time? Is it true, in other words, that the veterans not in need, the 500,000 who have not borrowed, would keep their certificates and finally would receive $1,125, whereas the veteran who is in need would receive, in addition to the $500 which he has already borrowed, about $180? Is that true?

Mr. CONNALLY. It is true in part and it is not true in part. If the amendment of the Senator from Texas should be adopted he would receive, in addition to the $180 which the Senator from Oregon mentions, whatever sum is necessary to rebate his interest at 2 percent instead of 3½ or 4 percent or whatever he paid.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator from Texas is defending his amendment and not the pending committee amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas is offering an amendment to the committee amendment. That amendment is a preferential amendment, and under the rule of the Senate will be voted upon before the vote comes on the Clark amendment.

Mr. STEIWER. What justification is there for giving a premium to the man who is not in need and in putting a penalty on the man who is in need?

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator from Oregon had shown any interest in the earlier remarks of the Senator from Texas, he would have seen that the Senator from Texas pointed out the fact that by reason of reducing the interest to 2 percent he was endeavoring to make up any apparent discrimination and pay the man in need, the man who had borrowed, on somewhat the same basis as the man who retains his certificate until 1945.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator's proposal would not put them on a parity basis, would it? It would merely remove part of the discrimination.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think it would remove practically all of it. The veteran who keeps his certificate until 1945 does not get a dollar until 1945. The man who has already borrowed 50 percent has had the use of that money in addition to whatever money he will now receive. If we compute interest on that money until 1945 it will be seen that he will be in just as good a position as the man who gets $1,115 then and who has had no money in the meantime, and perhaps he will be in a better position.

Mr. STEIWER. Except that the man who is paid now loses his life insurance, whereas the man who is not in need retains his life insurance.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is now concerned with preserving life insurance for the veterans. Of course every man who keeps his certificate has protection for his family in the way of life insurance until 1945; but the Senator from Oregon wants to take that away from every veteran because he proposes to pay them all off now, so the soldier who might die next year without any insurance policy would leave nothing, perhaps, to his wife and children.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. All we get for the soldier under the Harrison bill is $175.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; he would get more than that.

Mr. LONG. Well, $180. He has borrowed the remainder.

Mr. CONNALLY. All of them have not.

Mr. LONG. Nearly all of them have. It is a very simple proposition, Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought the Senator was going to ask me a question.

Mr. LONG. No; I want to keep anybody else from asking the Senator a question. I want to vote. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Occupants of the galleries are guests of the Senate and must observe the rule of the Senate which prohibits any demonstration of approval or disapproval in the galleries.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Louisiana is very anxious now for a vote and wants to stop the Senator from Texas. The Senator from Louisiana has probably occupied as much of the time of the Senate as has any other Senator. I hope he will please be patient and let some of us humble Members, some of us who are not always spotted by the occupants of the galleries and whose antics are not always watched with interest and curiosity by the occupants of the galleries, have a word to say now and then. I hope he will let some of us humble Senators talk just a little.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Texas has my permission to talk.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator for his permission. It is very gratifying to have the permission of the Senator from Louisiana. Although I am very small fish, it is pleasing to know the "Kingfish" is going to let me speak. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, reverting for a moment to the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], I want to do no injustice to him. I want it understood that I was not interpreting his attitude. The Senator from Texas was endeavoring to interpret his own attitude to the Senate. The Senator from Texas had hardly begun his remarks before the Senator from Missouri sought to inject himself into the speech of the Senator from Texas.

When I go back to my State and to my constituents, I do not want to have to say to the soldier: "Oh, yes, Mr. Veteran, I am for you; I am strong for you. I voted in Washington for a bill which I knew could not pass, it is true, but you read my speech and you will see how strong I am for the soldier, and how, as the election comes nearer and closer, I get stronger and stronger for him. I had an opportunity, it is true, to vote for a bill which had some chance of passing. I had an opportunity to vote for a bill which the President would have approved. I had an opportunity to vote for a bill which would have opened the doors of the Treasury and would have enabled you to receive your money. But I am a man who will not surrender a principle. No, Mr. Veteran, I will not surrender a principle. I am going to vote for principle. I am going to vote that you shall have every dollar that we can get for you, though I know when I am voting that you are not going to get a red cent."

Who is the best friend of the soldier, the Senator who votes for a bill that gives the veteran an opportunity to exercise his choice of keeping his certificate, or of obtaining cash, or of securing bonds, when he knows he is going to get one of the three, or the Senator who votes here with a gesture, one who simply holds out before the veteran who needs the cash an alluring speech, and an alluring vote, with no substantial result to come from it at all?

Mr. President, that is why I have offered the amendment to provide that the veteran shall not be charged interest on his loans at more than 2 percent annually and that while we are charging him only 2 percent we shall pay him 4 percent on the same money. I hope the Senate will adopt the pending amendment which I have offered as an amendment to the Harrison bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I objected awhile ago to any unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate on Monday. It is very apparent that there will not be an opportunity to discuss the bonus question as it should be discussed. Therefore I am going to take a few minutes now to state my attitude.

We did not pass the adjusted-compensation bill on account of the insistence of the soldier. We passed it voluntarily. The most solemn vote in all my experience as a United States Senator was cast the day we passed the draft bill, when, by the power of law, we drafted and dragged into the maelstrom of war the very flower of the youth of our country.

Any actuary could have sat down and calculated what was the average value of those young lives in dollars and cents. We did not do it. We drafted them as youth with no more regard for their human value and relation that if we had been drafting an equal number of cattle. It turned out that we needed 2,000,000 human units to use in the war which we had then declared. We drafted them without their volition or their consent, and we sent them as units. Their individuality was gone. We simply put them in the trenches, on board the ships, and wherever we needed human beings to meet the shock and horror of war; and we determined their value to us as units. What was it? About a dollar a day—enough to buy chewing gum and a few cigarettes—while they were to perform the horrible duty of stemming the tide of German ingenuity in the construction of death-dealing instruments.

I said we needed about 2,000,000 of those human units, whose value we disregarded. Then we needed about 26,000,000,000 gold units. Did we draft them? No; we entered into a bond with them that at the end of 45 years every gold unit would come back to its owner, with interest. We promised that they would bear an interest rate even beyond that which theretofore had been earned by such units. We entered into a bond with them by which we solemnly pledged that they would not be injured or their fecundity impaired. Yet here we are haggling over the question of a bonus to the human units, while we have been paying a billion dollars a year bonus to the gold units! We paid 4-percent interest on about $25,000,000,000. We have not haggled over that for 1 minute; and yet when we come to the simple question of paying to the human beings who won the war an adjusted compensation to equalize to some extent that which they received with that which those who did not go into the war received, every known subterfuge has been employed to forestall the payment of a debt of obligation which we ourselves in justice assumed.

There are two things involved in this matter. Let no man be deceived about it for 1 minute. It is not alone a question of adjusting the compensation; it is not that; it is the fear that the payment of this amount of money may inflate the currency, and therefore jeopardize the financial power which certain individuals have, nationally and internationally.

What has been the cry every time the bonus question has come up? "Why, the payment of such an amount of money would not only upset the whole circulating medium, but would endanger the credit of the Government!" God save the mark! We have just recently voted $5,000,000,000, for what purpose? For the purpose, wherever there is a necessity of bolstering up recovery while at the same time we have been absolutely refusing to meet a debt of obligation.

Mr. President, when the railroads were in distress, and the banks were in distress, we voted $2,000,000,000, and established a central bank known as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and went to their aid. Then when the question arose as to unemployment, as to the necessity for bolstering up our industrial life, we voted $5,000,000,000. We gave employment to those who needed it, and to thousands who did not need it. We poured out money in this relief business, which reeks of scandal; and yet when it comes to the question of compensating those who stood in the trenches, and whose lives were forfeit, we haggle by every manner of subterfuge over the question of whether or not we can chisel them down to a point where the Government will pay just as little as possible, when the Government of the United States today stands the creditor nation of the world by virtue of the sacrifice which these boys made!

I desire now to recur to a question which I am ashamed has arisen in this body. We are sent here for the purpose of legislating, not for the purpose of dodging a veto. Our States did not send us here for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a bill would be vetoed. They sent us here for the purpose of doing our duty, and letting the veto power assume its own responsibility.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is about the oldest Senator in point of service on this side of the aisle; and for that reason I desire to ask him to state his views about this talk in reference to a veto every time we have a bill before us. When I first came here, I was told that that kind of a threat never was made on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I said a moment ago, and I repeat, that I am ashamed that I am put by a Senator on this floor in the attitude of choosing between doing my duty and meeting a veto. The responsibility to do my duty is on me. The responsibility of a veto is on the Chief Executive. If he has good and sufficient reason to veto the bill, I have good and sufficient reason to vote the opposite way; and, so help me God, I will do it.

There is not a man on this floor worth the hide that covers him who will cringe and truckle before any veto. I desire to have it definitely understood that I respect the responsibility and the awful position in these trying times of the Chief Executive; but I also respect my responsibility as a legislator, and I would rather risk the judgment of those of us who have to legislate than to risk the judgment of one who does not have to legislate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will recall that when we were legislating on this subject in 1924, there were certain advocates of the cash optional plan.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I quote from the Senator at that time. This was on April 22, 1924:

> I say that I am not even going to stand here and advocate a cash bonus, because since these telegrams have come from the leaders of the Legion saying that they want the bill just as it is, without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t", verbatim et literatim et spellatim, I am going to let them have it just as they want it.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; and I am going to let the soldiers have it now just as they want it, and the majority of them now want the Patman bill. A handful of those who deceived me then cannot deceive me now. I know who needs this money. Let me for just a moment call attention to this matter:

Suppose a majority of the soldiers were to say that they did not want the money. Do not the Senator and I both realize that if we were to pay the bonus now, as the Patman bill calls for, it would put into circulation money which all of us know must be put into circulation, or the recovery about which we talk will be indefinitely deferred?

All other Members of the Senate know, as I know, that a ship cannot float without water. The old financial ship is on the bottom; and the reason why it is not floated is simply because those who have money are afraid to put it into circulation, and the Government is afraid to antagonize them, and therefore it is selling bonds. We have piled up a bond issue of enormous proportions. Talk about not running the printing press! I am no more in favor of running the printing press than are others who take that view because they do not wish to inflate the currency; but what are we doing today? We ought not to run the printing press and inflate. What are we doing when we are printing bonds but running the printing press, with this difference: We are creating a great leisure class in this country to whom we are selling the taxing power of America. The men who hold these bonds clip the coupons, and you and I and the soldiers go out and make the wherewithal to meet the coupons.

Let me use an illustration. One in high place used an illustration in talking to me about the Boulder Dam. He said: "Suppose this dam were Government property and a self-liquidating proposition, and I were to borrow $500,000,000 and give bonds as collateral security at 3-percent interest, the bonds to run for 35 years. When the dam was completed, the sale of the water rights, irrigation rights, and power rights would begin to amortize the cost of it, and at the end of 35 years I would have paid $940,000,000. But suppose, in lieu of borrowing the money, Treasury notes are issued to the amount of $500,000,000. The dam is built, the amortization sets in through the sale of the power rights and water rights, and at the end of the 35 years the dam will be the property of the United States, and as the amortization money comes in, the debt will be canceled to the amount of $500,000,000, the project costing practically not a penny, the credit of the United States being used to provide the funds for the erection of that which for all time will be a perpetual source of income."

As a matter of course, every time we want to perform any function of the Government, we must sell a bond. I state here today that, so far as I am concerned, so long as I am a Member of the Senate I will never vote for another bond issue for industrial purposes. I do not believe it is just and right to the American people to create a leisure class, such as the one we now have, numbering thousands, while we do not inflate the currency or increase the circulating medium one penny. We are simply increasing bank credit, and leaving the people subject to the whims of those who own these securities, just as we were at their mercy when we were plunged into the abyss of this terrible depression.

Coming back to the soldiers' bonus, I challenge any Senator on this floor to say why, if we were to issue currency sufficient to meet the bonus, it would not have the effect of distributing the money throughout the length and breadth of the land, and increasing the prices of commodities, and making living more tolerable in this country than it now is. Not only would we pay the soldiers, but we would distribute a circulating medium, which today seems to be practically impossible. We have tried it by all the methods of the N. R. A., and the P. W. A., and the different alphabetical bureaus, and the net result has been to paralyze the public with fear because they do not know at what time all these activities may cease or become permanent. If they become permanent, then the private individual is out; if they cease, then who is to restore confidence?

Mr. President, there are but two things that confront us today. One is to take such measures as will restore the confidence of the farmers and business men in their own ability to carry on and make this country prosperous, and we ought to address ourselves to restoring that confidence by furnishing them individually the wherewithal to carry on. Banks are not lending. The money itself is locked up. There is no chance of getting the wherewithal to carry on, and if anyone is afraid of inflation and is afraid of the printing press, the Patman bill restricts the amount to the specific sum promised the soldier.

It will do two things. First, it will settle a debt of honor. If the public at large needs $5,000,000,000 to help them to carry on, do not Senators suppose that the amount owing the soldiers would be an aid to that process?

Mr. President, it is with a feeling of personal humiliation that I sit here in the United States Senate and see Senators quibble about the question of settling the bonus while we do not bat an eye at passing a measure appropriating $5,000,000,000, the expenditure of which is to be unrestricted, without earmarking, to be used at the discretion of the administration.

Talk about the soldier saying, "The wonderful speech you made." The only soldier in whom I am interested particularly is the soldier who is now speaking to the Senate, and when I look in the mirror to comb my hair I am going to look at a man or know the reason why. There is no man or set of men, no administration, or anyone in power that will ever influence me in casting a vote or performing my duty as a United States Senator. I think we should frown upon a threat to the effect that if we pass a certain bill it will receive a veto. Who is going to subordinate his intellectual processes to anybody else and become an intellectual prostitute?

I am sorry the question of a veto was brought in here. I am just as loyal as any man on this floor, more so, perhaps, than most, to the Democratic party and to Democratic doctrine, and it is just as foreign to democracy as the poles are far apart to have an attempt at domination by any man over the wills of other men.

I state here and now that I hope the Senator from Mississippi is absolutely mistaken in what he has said. We are supposed to gather in this Chamber, and in our offices, and study the problems which confront the American people, and to solve them as we determine they need solving, and not ask any men or set of men, not charged with the duty of legislation, what we shall do.

I had intended not to say anything on the question of the bonus, but to content myself with voting; but when I see the Senate voting billions, not knowing what the money is to be used for, three billion last year, five billion this year, and then, when we come to the question of settling an obligation which we assumed, note the resort to all manner of subterfuges and all varieties of indirection, I cannot sit silent.

Let us meet the issue fairly and squarely. Let us do two things, pay the soldiers and increase the circulating medium; give the soldiers the bargaining power, for every man knows that when the soldiers get the money it will be spent.

In this connection I have heard some Senators say, "If we pay the bonus, the soldiers will go out and be buying all manner of stuff. They will buy automobiles."

What has anyone to do with the way in which I spend the money which he owes me? It would not influence my vote one particle if I knew they would take the money paid them and burn it up. If I owe them, it is my duty to pay them.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. They want the money so they can buy something, do they not?

Mr. SMITH. As a matter of course; but the Senator knows, as I know, that the objection to the payment of the bonus is the most unreasonable thing from the standpoint of common sense that ever was urged before this body. The reason why there is opposition to it is that certain powers do not want an inflation of the currency. The Senator knows that, and I know it. What is the use beating about the bush? It scares them to death to think that $2,000,000,000 of fresh money will be put into circulation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. These people do not object to inflation of credit, however.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no; because when we inflate credit we pay the men from whom we buy the credit, and that is what the sale of Government bonds means.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As a matter of fact, the bigger the credit base the greater the tendency to diminish the money base. In other words, they have always kept us piling up bonds, because the more bonds, the more money we need, and therefore the few who have the ready cash in their hands can always buy at "distress" prices.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the merest tyro who will study even superficially the system under which we operate knows that it is by and for the banking interests of this country, who say, "Hypothecate your bonds and get that much credit, and then sell that credit."

The minute we came to the question of issuing currency to pay the soldiers, then it became impossible to pay them. Take all these bills and read them. Every one of them inches around to the bond idea, with a partial payment, and then the soldier can accept a bond, upon which the Government is to pay somebody 3 percent.

As I said in the beginning of my speech, we paid the bankers of this country a billion dollars a year bonus on the gold units they let us use during the war, and now there are those who are not willing to pay $2,000,000,000 to the human units who won the war.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that since the depression came the national debt has increased from about $15,000,000,000 to the point where it is now approximately $30,000,000,000? Is it not a fact that this year we shall issue bonds to the extent of several billion dollars? Is it not also a fact that for next year we have already obligated the Government to issue bonds to the extent of $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000? Is it not a further fact that because of this increased issue of bonds the depression has turned out to be a bankers' jubilee?

Mr. SMITH. Why, yes; as a matter of course. We have turned over to the bankers of America the income of the people—to pay for what? To pay for securities for which they themselves were responsible. The money we borrow becomes an obligation of the Government, and the bond we issue is an obligation of the Government. Here we are, as the Senator from Oklahoma indicates, absolutely converting this depression into a bankers' jubilee. They can fill their safes and strong boxes with bonds of the United States and not be forced to lend a dollar commercially.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I wonder if the Senator from South Carolina noticed a short time ago that a member of the Rockefeller family and a member of the Morgan family, from the two respective banking-house firms, set up a separate organization to buy in distressed property, and that the statement was made that they were getting it for about 10 cents on the dollar during these distressed times.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the whole system, the whole condition, is made manifest right here today by the fact that we will not even go to the extent of paying in money an obligation which we assumed, but will haggle back and forth in order to try to gerrymander the Senate into the position of issuing bonds from which someone may clip coupons. I intend, if possible, to find out who owns the bonds and where they are. We know the aggregate of the interest we have to pay. Here we are right now with two propositions before us providing for the issuance of more bonds for the purpose of meeting an obligation, while the circulating medium throughout the country is so inadequate that business is prostrate.

Mr. President, I have before me clippings from various newspapers which indicate what business is looking for and is waiting for. Just the other day the price of silver started to go up, and every commodity in this country followed pari passu. Soon thereafter silver started to go down, and every commodity in the country went down pari passu. Yet we play with the destiny of the American people in failing to issue sufficient currency to guarantee exchange under the law of supply and demand.

I have before me, but I shall not take the time to read them, newspaper clippings showing how trade responded to the hope of an adequate medium of exchange to increase the bargaining power of the masses. As soon as the advance in silver stopped, the market stopped. When silver started down, the market started down.

I plead with my colleagues, now that we have the opportunity not only of discharging an obligation of debt but also of meeting, in part, the requirement of an expanded currency, the benefits of which will go into every nook and corner of this land, that we take advantage of this opportunity and discharge this debt without its costing anyone a single penny. Of course, these notes, when issued, will be guaranteed by the Government, but they will bear no interest. Every bond which goes out guaranteed by the Government bears interest. The notes can be used in such small denominations as to reflect themselves into an encouraged and expanded trade. The bonds will find their way into the banker's strongbox and become a burden on every taxpayer. We must this day choose whether we are willing to burden the people still more with a bond issue, the sale of which will increase the debt and taxes of the people, or whether we will issue Treasury certificates which will expand the currency, renew the hope of the people, and discharge the obligation of debt.

Mr. President, I did not feel like expressing myself on this question this afternoon; but after the statement was made by the Senator from Mississippi that if certain bills were passed they would meet a veto, I determined then to make a statement.

I sincerely hope that hereafter no expression such as that will be made. If Senators will stop and think for a moment they will agree that such a statement does not have the right flavor, anyhow. This is a country of freemen. I hope it is a country of honest, courageous thinkers. Honest confession is good for the soul. If I were inclined to vote for one bill and I knew that another bill had been threatened with a veto, I believe I should vote for the other bill. It is not a very praiseworthy position for United States Senators to take that they should be deterred from doing their duty on the plea that they might get something by being subservient, and get nothing if they are honest men. I should rather go to the soldiers and say, "Boys, I did my duty; and if you are worth the hide on you, you will stand for what you think is right, whether you ever get a penny or not."

I am not making this speech to get votes. God made me a man before South Carolina made me a Senator; and I am going to be a man, or try to be one, or at least make an assault with intent to be one. I hope that never again, especially in a Democratic Senate, will there go out the word, during the pendency of a bill, that it is threatened with a veto. Thank God, we also have the veto power! When two-thirds of the Senate say, "In our judgment, so and so is right", we can exercise a veto. We can veto a veto; and we can keep on with this kind of thing until the people will veto all the vetoers.

Mr. President, I said I was in favor of the Patman bill. I am in favor of the Patman bill because it is the one which is straightforward, honest, and which is without any subterfuge. I know that lawyers are a necessary evil; but, God bless your soul, whenever they get hold of an instrument and put into it "whereas" and "whereas", and "the party of the first part and the party of the second part have hereby agreed, and henceforth shall continue to agree, and whereas, and whereas, the party of the first part and the party of the second part", they wind up at the point where the party of the third part, namely, the poor devil who is having the contract drawn, does not get a thing. That is all there is to it. They just do not know how to go straight to the point, because it is profitable not to go to it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask for a vote.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Arizona does not like to hear these forceful words against the attitude which he has assumed; but I am fond of him. I deplore his lack of judgment, but I admire him in spite thereof.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator for once in his life is mistaken. There has been no Senator on the floor here during my period of service to whom I have listened with greater attention, or whose speeches I have read more diligently, than those of the scholar-farmer, the senior Senator from South Carolina. The Senator for once misspoke himself. When I said "Let us vote", I was anxious that we should reach a conclusion on this question today. The Senator had paused; and knowing how uninterruptedly his stream of eloquence flows, I thought if there was a pause, he must have finished. That is all.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona has now demonstrated his good judgment by saying that he always listens to what I have to say. I am sorry he does not always profit by his judgment.

Mr. President, I am through. I hope the soldiers' bonus bill will be passed as it came from the House.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he sits down?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is the Senator in favor of full payment of the bonus?

Mr. SMITH. I am.

Mr. CLARK. Then the Senator is against a partial payment of the bonus, if he is in favor of the full payment of the bonus.

Mr. SMITH. I think the Patman bill comes nearer meeting my idea of settling this question than either the Vinson bill or the Harrison bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am not at present inquiring as to the Senator's choice between the Patman bill and either the Vinson bill or the Harrison bill. I asked the Senator if he was in favor of full payment of the soldiers' bonus.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I am.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator said he was. Then I drew what I think to be the logical conclusion—and if I am not correct in my conclusion, the Senator will correct me—that he is against a partial payment and in favor of a full payment.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Then, on the question which is to be presented between the Vinson and the Harrison bill, am I justified in assuming that the Senator is for the Vinson bill as against the Harrison bill?

Mr. SMITH. If I were restricted to the two, I should prefer the Vinson bill, since the Thomas amendment has been adopted.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is aware of the fact that after the determination of the question as between the Vinson bill and the Harrison bill, the question then will be as between the Patman bill, on the one hand, and the Harrison bill, on the other hand.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am in favor of immediate cash payment of the adjusted certificates to veterans of the World War. I want to see these certificates paid in full, and at the earliest possible date. I believe this is a just debt. For those reasons I intend to support the measure as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives. I am in favor of the so-called "Patman bill."

It is not my intention to enter into a prolonged discussion of the various measures from which we are to choose. I cannot support the measure brought before us by the Finance Committee, the so-called "Harrison measure." To my mind, it does not provide immediate cash payment in full at all. It proposes to scale down, and scale down drastically, the amounts the veterans would receive.

It is only necessary to point out two examples to show what the Harrison measure does to the veterans. The holder of a $1,000 certificate, if he takes immediate cash payment under this measure, would receive, instead of the $1,000, only $768, either in cash or in bonds. That is not my idea of cash payment of the adjusted certificate for $1,000.

Take the case of the veteran holding a $1,000 certificate on which he has borrowed the limit, or $500. That means he still has an equity in the certificate of $500. Under the so-called "Harrison plan", now before the Senate, he would receive, not $500, but $180. That is not my idea of cash payment of the bonus—to cut the payment down from $500 to $180.

So I cannot support the Harrison plan. To me that would be a breach of faith with the veterans of the World War, when such action is called cash payment.

I could support the so-called "Vinson plan." It provides cash payment in full of the adjusted-service certificates, but it does not provide in the bill itself any appropriation or means of making the payment. To that extent it falls short of providing immediate payment. It might even be possible, if the Vinson bill were enacted, to have the bonus fight made all over again in both branches of Congress.

So I intend to support and vote for the Patman measure, in preference to either of the other plans. The difference in provisions of the Patman and Vinson bills in regard to forgiving interest on loans made on the certificates is not as important as assurance that payment will be made in cash, and will be made immediately.

The Patman measure as it came to us from the House will pay $2,000,000,000 to some three and one-half million veterans. This payment can be made without a bond issue or any increase in taxes. I am not afraid of inflationary developments from these payments. The Secretary of the Treasury may, if he deems it advisable, retire Federal Reserve notes as United States notes are paid the veterans. Not that I am advocating this procedure, but that power is given the Secretary, as I read the bill.

The Government has ample gold reserves to take care of these payments. The money will be distributed in every community in the United States. It will be a Nation-wide distribution of purchasing power, placed where it is needed, and where it will be used.

And last, but not least, the veterans are entitled to immediate cash payment of the bonus in full. I hope the Patman bill is enacted by the Senate. It is my first choice, under the present legislative situation. The Harrison proposal, frankly, can get my support only as a last resort.

I, for one, am prepared to vote without further argument.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	King	Pope
Ashurst	Copeland	La Follette	Radcliffe
Austin	Costigan	Lewis	Robinson
Bachman	Couzens	Logan	Russell
Bankhead	Dickinson	Lonergan	Schall
Barkley	Dieterich	Long	Schwellenbach
Bilbo	Donahey	McAdoo	Sheppard
Black	Duffy	McCarran	Shipstead
Bone	Fletcher	McGill	Smith
Borah	Frazier	McKellar	Steiwer
Brown	Gerry	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkley	Gibson	Metcalf	Thomas, Utah
Bulow	Glass	Minton	Townsend
Burke	Gore	Moore	Trammell
Byrd	Hale	Murphy	Truman
Byrnes	Harrison	Murray	Tydings
Capper	Hastings	Neely	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hatch	Norris	Van Nuys
Carey	Hayden	Nye	Wagner
Clark	Johnson	Overton	Walsh
Connally	Keyes	Pittman	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] to the committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is some difference of opinion as to whether we should proceed tonight to the end, or whether we should make an effort to reach a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on Monday at a certain time and to fix a reasonable limitation on debate on further amendments and probably dispose of the whole question Monday. I am, of course, willing to do whatever the Senate desires. If it is desired to proceed further tonight, I am willing to do so. I hope we may enter into some reasonable agreement to vote on Monday, limiting debate on other amendments after the pending amendment shall have been disposed of. I am not particular as to the time limit to be fixed. I am only anxious that we shall, if possible, conclude the whole matter on Monday.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that we take a vote on the pending amendment, which is the proposal to substitute the Vinson bill for the Patman bill, and then recess until Monday.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that that would not be agreeable.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. What is the reason why the Senator does not want to vote now? We are all ready now to vote, and the Senate is here. We are ready to vote on the Vinson substitute; so, when everybody has been called in here to vote, why stop a vote?

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to vote on this and other amendments that may be offered, and to a final vote on the bill tonight.

Mr. CLARK. I object to that. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Louisiana that there are numerous Senators who are entitled to vote on this question who have left under the impression that no vote would be taken today on the final passage of the measure. They are Senators who have been in constant attendance here throughout the session, but who, for various reasons, have engagements out of town necessitating their leaving this afternoon.

I do not know whether the Senator from Louisiana has a special session of the Louisiana Legislature, or an arms conference, or what the consideration may be which makes it necessary for him to have a vote tonight, but I suggest that this is a question of sufficient importance to justify the statement that it should be voted upon by as large an attendance of the Senate as can possibly be obtained.

So far as I am concerned, I shall be glad to have a vote this afternoon on the substitute which I have offered for the committee amendment. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has indicated that he is not willing to have that done unless the bill is to be pushed through to final passage tonight. In justice to the Senators who have left who are entitled to vote on this measure, and who have been in constant attendance at the sessions of the Senate during the present session of the Congress, I think no rush movement should be attempted.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I submit another unanimous-consent request—that when the Senate concludes its session today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday, and that not later than 1 o'clock on Monday the vote shall be taken upon the pending amendment, and that after that amendment shall have been disposed of no Senator shall speak longer than 20 minutes on any amendment or on the bill.

Mr. LONG. No, Mr. President; we will not agree to that.

SEVERAL SENATORS. What is the matter?

Mr. LONG. I will state what is the matter. We do not care to adjourn until Monday morning so that the President can work on the Members overnight. That is all this proposal means. Let us vote on this amendment now. Then we will talk about a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Louisiana must appreciate the fact that at the beginning of the session he was a strong advocate of the Vinson bill, as well as some others.

Mr. LONG. Yes; but it is not the Vinson bill now. It is the Vinson-Thomas-Long-Clark bill now. It is no longer the Vinson bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor. Does the Senator yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HARRISON. I make that unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. I object.

Mr. ASHURST (and other Senators). Vote!

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield the floor?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield the floor.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to detain the Senate for not more than a moment. I simply wish to point out that, whatever the parliamentary situation may be, there are three separate propositions before the Senate:

One is the House bill, the so-called "Patman bill", which is primarily an inflation bill, and secondarily a bill for the payment of the bonus, providing for the payment of the bonus in printing-press money.

As a substitute for that, the Committee on Finance has offered a substitute commonly denominated the "Harrison bill", providing for paying the so-called "cash surrender value" of the certificates, but, instead of paying it in cash, it provides for paying it in bonds or money; but the inference, I think, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi himself, is that the cash surrender value is to be paid in bonds.

The third proposition is the so-called "Vinson bill." Unlike the Senator from Louisiana, I am not anxious to attach my name in conjunction with that of the author of the bill, which originated in the House of Representatives. I call it the "Vinson bill", although I offered it in the Senate as an amendment. The so-called "Vinson bill" provides for the full cash payment of the bonus certificates.

Any of those plans involves a readjustment of the basis of the Adjusted Service Certificate Act as passed in 1924. The difference of adjustment between the Vinson bill and the Patman bill is not important.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. In reading the bill which has been offered by the Senator from Missouri as a substitute, I find no provision for raising the money with which to pay the bonus, or for issuing bonds with which to obtain the money with which to pay it, or for printing money with which to pay it. What is the Senator's understanding as to how the money is to be raised?

Mr. CLARK. I may say to the Senator from Kentucky that that provision was deliberately left out of the bill. It was the intention of the sponsors of immediate cash payment of the bonus that no other controversial question should be involved in this one. It was felt that the essential matter was the acknowledgment on the part of the United States of the debt and the appropriation of the money, just as was done in the case of the work-relief joint resolution which was passed a few weeks ago.

I may say to the Senator from Kentucky that, so far as I am personally concerned, I am in favor of the plan of financing the bonus suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, which is to apply to the inheritance-tax structure of the United States the plan presently employed as to the income-tax structure; but I have not undertaken, and the Representative from Kentucky who originally introduced the bill in the House has not undertaken, to incorporate that plan in the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator in just a moment, as soon as I answer the question of the Senator from Kentucky. It was the theory of the proponents of the cash payment of the bonus who followed the Vinson plan that Congress should be left absolutely free as to the method of raising the money and paying the bonus, without any attempt to inject another different and highly controversial question into the matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the bill which is offered as a substitute leaves Congress perfectly free, because it has nothing in it about how the money is to be raised, or in any way providing for raising the money. Is it assumed that under existing authority, without any specific reference to the matter in this bill, the Secretary of the Treasury will issue bonds, sell them to the public, and thus raise the money with which to pay the certificates?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, it is assumed that the money will be raised just as the money will be raised which is appropriated in the $4,800,000,000 joint resolution of which the Senator from Kentucky was so eloquent a champion on this floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. By which, I suppose, the Senator means I did not open my mouth. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. It was appropriated in the terms of the joint resolution, which created an obligation of the Government, and made an appropriation to deal with it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I shall be glad now to yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I am at a loss to understand why the Senator does not let us vote on the amendment. We are ready to vote on it.

Mr. CLARK. I shall be very glad to let the Senate vote on the amendment. I have consumed very little time. I happen to be the proponent of the amendment. The Senator from Louisiana talked for an hour and a half today, and injected himself into the speeches of several other Senators. I have claimed the right to address the Senate for not to exceed 5 minutes. I shall not delay the vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to conclude by saying that there are three propositions before the Senate. One is for a partial payment, which will not settle the issue, which will not prevent the same issue from being before the Senate and the Congress at the next session of the Congress. Another is the Patman bill, which is primarily an inflation bill, and employs the bonus only as a means and an excuse for issuing printing-press money. A third is the Vinson bill, which is a straight, outright proposal for the payment of the bonus in full in cash.

Mr. President, on this vote the issue will be not between the Patman bill, between the advocates of inflation and incidental payment of the bonus and the other advocates of payment of the bonus in full, but the issue on the vote which is about to be taken will be between the advocates of payment in full and the advocates of payment in part.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, impressed by the statement made by the Senator from Missouri that certain Senators are absent who desire to vote, and that there can be no conclusion of the whole matter today, I shall move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon Monday.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. SCHALL. I desire to have the clerk read a short statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield for that purpose?

Mr. ROBINSON. Will not the Senator be content to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SCHALL. It is very short.

Mr. ROBINSON. I cannot yield for a speech.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I merely wish to say to the Senator that, as I understand, he wants an adjournment, and we are not going to interfere with the filibuster.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no filibuster, and I am not going to move an adjournment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Arkansas that I think the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] would be content to have the statement to which he has referred published in the RECORD, and he makes that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter submitted by Mr. SCHALL is as follows:

ADMINISTRATION DUST

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD an editorial on dust. The dust with which this article deals is not the false-propaganda dust this administration throws around to keep the public blinded to the truth, but the real soil, easily loosened by lack of seeding and cultivation, that is being blown away from the fields of the Southwest where the President and his "brain trust" bribed the farmer to let the fertile land lie idle, that want and starvation might help the chaos and further the grandiose ambitions of this administration. The same thing happened in the Northwest last year. Next year it will be somewhere else unless the American people wake up and protest this sinful and godless plan of crop and food destruction that this administration has imported. "Whoso boasteth himself of a false gift is like clouds and wind without rain."

We have been taught, as a people, that to waste food or money or material was a sin, that a patch on our clothing was honorable; "waste not, want not", has been a national precept. But we have been led away by false gods from the things taught and practiced for generations. This administration has gone right along with the forces of destruction in nature. Their plowing under of cotton is a blood brother to the bollweevil; killing hogs matches hog cholera; the reduction of corn and wheat aids and abets the corn borer and the chinch bug and the grasshopper. All destructive forces of evil seem to aline themselves with this administration.

When he ran for office in 1932, the President assured the farmers he had a remedy for their problem of low prices and surplus farm crops. Now, 2 years after taking office, not only has he done away with the surplus but is already buying wheat, corn, rye, meat, and so forth, from foreign countries while he pays the farmer not to plant and keeps the worker on the dole.

Administration spokesmen say dust flies because the farmer does not plow deep enough, but the farmer cannot understand why his plowing under the new deal brings dust storms when it did not before the days of "planned chaos" fell upon him. And how does it come that dust falls instead of rain in the rainy season in Arizona, Nevada, and California?

The new deal introduced new ideas of how to run our country—novel and foreign ideas—that this is a government of men and not of laws, that the way to get rich is to burn and destroy, that the way to help the worker is to raise prices on everything he buys, the way to help the farmer is to pay him not to farm and buy our food from foreign countries, the way to take care of the worker is to abolish his working hours and put him on the dole, the way to encourage production is to threaten business and confiscate profits through taxation and regimentation, the way to help America first is to join the World Court to entangle us in foreign affairs and help the foreign countries by giving them our markets through reciprocal-trade treaties made in secret without benefit of representation except by foreign interests, and the way to help the soldier is to cut him off his compensation and put him out of the hospitals and deny him his rightful bonus.

However, these novel ideas seem not to have met with favor above, for rain falls as dust and the earth is laid waste. A voice seems to speak from on high that we are following false prophets who have forsaken the teachings of Christ on which our country was founded and God's scourge is a warning to shake ourselves free from such leadership and save the Republic.

When the arrogance of the administration and its godlings has set at naught and upset the delicate balance of supply and demand, and undertaken to promulgate laws to regulate crops and seasons and decrease flocks and herds in defiance of the laws of the Creator, God reaches out and takes a hand. He looses the whirlwinds of His wrath upon the poor denuded acres, long years safely bound by their grasses and crops against the heaviest winds, but stripped of their protective root carpet by the devils of destruction of the new deal. They sought to limit a percentage of acreage. In punishment, behold! The dust storms are blowing millions of acres of fertile soil away and piling it up on other millions to destroy their sprouting crops. A grim example to this sneering, godless, communistic group, and if they do not profit by it, worse will follow. God is not mocked. He does not read the fawning press nor the administration releases, nor is He moved by the constant bray of the radio pundits. Whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth. There must be hope for us yet, since He still thinks there are some in this country sane enough to perceive the lesson of this chastening calamity, this violent devastating catastrophe, and to throw the plot of the foreign money changers out of the temple of our liberties.

Says the Lord in Deuteronomy:

And I shall send grass in thy fields for thy cattle, that thou mayest eat and be full.

Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived, and yet turn aside, and serve other gods, and worship them;

And then the Lord's wrath be kindled against you, and He shut up the heaven, that there be no rain, and that the land yield not her fruit; and lest ye perish quickly from off the good land which the Lord giveth you.

DUST IN THE NEW DEAL

By Blair Coan

The new deal did not take Providence into consideration when it decided to destroy his blessings by ravaging the green fields of the Middle West. We were told the new deal was a "practical" thing, not dependent on the Ruler of the Universe or the elements. That everything would be accomplished by "scientific" processes. Nature was to be controlled by this band of dullards masquerading as wise men. So we stopped, looked, and listened.

This quackery seemed to appeal to the masses who were bored by the ordinary processes of evolution. Tired of the ordinary delay in all things. Why wait 7 years for a fruit tree to produce its burden? Mr. Roosevelt and his "brain trust", according to the high-powered press agents of the "new deal", could accomplish this fruition in less than 7 minutes. All things were just as simple (and we mean simple). The public was taken by new-deal yarns and for 2 years has been swallowing the bait without batting an eye. Perhaps it still believes these fairy tales, but there are a few sophisticated people who are beginning to understand that Providence has taken a hand in this destruction of plenty while many are in want.

The Middle West is being laid waste by dust storms. As soon as they began, new-deal press agents got on the job. From coast to coast they broadcast the story that because the people of the plains States had plowed up the buffalo grass, once native there, the wind was able to pick up the loose earth and blow it about, destroying whole counties of fertile land. This was a good story and the new deal is still sticking to it.

An inquiring person might ask this unique outfit of demigod politicians a very embarrassing question: "Why is it that it is more than 30 years since this buffalo grass was plowed up, and that the wind has always blown as hard as it is doing now, and yet these devastating dust storms never occurred before?" Perhaps they have an answer for the question, but we are sure it would not be the truth.

The simple truth is that the buffalo grass did hold the earth together and protect it from these winds which blow almost daily, but as the farmers plowed it up they planted crops of wheat and corn. The country being dry, much of the farming was done by what is called the "dry farming" process. That is plowing deeply and turning up the soil down deep where the moisture has settled from the winter snows. Also crops grown on these lands develop long roots, which reach down to the moisture soil below, and these crops with these roots have been holding the soil in its original place for more than 30 years.

But Mr. Roosevelt and the "new dealers" had their own plan. They paid the farmers not to plant these crops and not to plow deeply and bring up the moisture-laden soil which for 30 years had successfully resisted the efforts of the winds to blow it away. Thus the soil dried out, and the usual parching summer sun reduced it to a fine powder. Then came the wind, and it blew and it blew, and there were no long roots of growing crops to hold it in place, and there was no moisture brought up to the surface by deep plowing; and the powdered soil began rising in the winds, and the winds kept blowing, as they always do, and the farmers who thought they were getting something by taking money out of the United States Treasury that they did not work for found that in return they had lost their farms for a few paltry dollars.

And this is why the Midwest is having dust storms and why farmers are losing their farms through an act not of Providence but of the new deal. And the new deal can rant and rave and declare they did not do it, but every farmer who has lost anything through dust storms has but one person to thank, and he is sitting in a big white house in Washington thinking how he can make the fish bite in the bright blue British waters off the coast of Nassau.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Col. Charles Ransom Reynolds, Medical Corps, to be Surgeon General, with the rank of major general, for a period of 4 years from date of acceptance, with rank from June 1, 1935, vice Maj. Gen. Robert U. Patterson, Surgeon General, whose term of office expires May 31, 1935; also the nominations of several other general officers in the Regular Army.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers for appointment, by transfer, in the Regular Army.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Henry B. Foster to be postmaster at Haleyville, Ala.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that nomination has been reported adversely. I ask that it be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

The nomination was rejected.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar, with the exception of that of Henry B. Foster, which has just been rejected, be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS TO MONDAY

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, May 6, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 3, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, today we rejoice in health, happiness, and in the pride of life; Thou art mindful of us when we forget Thee, and careful of us when we are careless of ourselves. Accept our thanksgiving and praise and hear our humble appeal that just motives and earnest solicitude may thoroughly direct the Congress. With conviction and understanding may we be men with a message, men with a purpose, and men with a spirit to meet the challenge of our urgent duty. May we resolutely bear witness of our fidelity and justify our high calling. Hold us to the firm realization that while God is God it is always right to do right. Gracious Lord, bless our country and grant that its broad and extensive horizon may soon redden with a glowing hope and promise. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DUFFY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by Mr. Frank E. Gannett, publisher of the Rochester Times Union and the Democrat and Chronicle. This address is on the banking situation and I think would be helpful to the discussion of the bill now pending before the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us who made this speech?

Mr. DUFFY of New York. Mr. Frank E. Gannett, publisher of the Gannett Newspapers, a resident of Rochester, N. Y. He is the publisher of the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle and the Times Union. This is on the banking bill, and I think would be helpful to the consideration of the bill now before the House.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the Vanderlip speech?

Mr. DUFFY of New York. No.

Mr. MICHENER. Would the gentleman include the Vanderlip speech also?

Mr. DUFFY of New York. I asked permission to insert that speech and it was not granted.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I suggest to the gentleman that he include certain excerpts of the Vanderlip speech, especially where he said that the farmers of America knew more about currency than the bankers?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I certainly do not like to object to requests that my colleagues make, and I shall not object. I do not think the Members ought to put speeches of other people in the RECORD in their extension of remarks. I do not care what any Member of Congress says in his own speech. He may make a speech criticizing the administration, he may make a speech criticizing me or anyone else and put it in the RECORD, but do not put the addresses of other people in the RECORD. Those things have no right to be in there under extension of remarks. I wish my amiable colleague, the gentleman from New York, would be magnanimous and set a precedent by withdrawing his request.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am going to ask permission to extend my remarks and to include therein a speech delivered by the Secretary of War and another speech by the Chief of Engineers of the Army. Would the gentleman have objection?

Mr. WOODRUM. Government officials are different. This is a practice that has grown up just recently and it is not proper. We used to have a rule that we would not include these various addresses and newspaper articles in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Where will this all end?

Mr. DUFFY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I only made this request because I thought it would be helpful in the discussion of the banking bill now before the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the reluctance to object on the other side, I will do the dirty work and object.

Mr. DUFFY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to invite the attention of the Members of the House to the standard forms for bridge bills which have been worked out over a period of years by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has jurisdiction of all bills authorizing the construction of bridges over navigable streams, State lines, and international boundaries. These forms are the result of much study and labor, in addition to long experience in handling bridge legislation.

A large number of these bills is referred to the committee each year. For example, in the last Congress the Subcommittee on Bridges considered 176 bills, 104 of which were reported by the full committee to the House, 90 of which passed the House and 86 of which passed both Houses.

Recently a number of Members have failed to follow the standard forms, probably because they were not available to the Members in printed form. That has caused a good deal of confusion and delay. It has been found necessary by the committee to correct many bills and sometimes to have them rewritten and reintroduced.

These bridge bills are of great importance to the Members sponsoring them, and of great interest to their respective constituencies. It will be a source of convenience to the Members of the House, will obviate the necessity of frequent delays, and expedite the passage of bridge legislation, if the Members in introducing bridge bills will adhere to the following approved and standard forms:

FORMS FOR BRIDGE BILLS

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

NO. 5

(Form for privately owned toll bridge, intrastate)

A bill authorizing _____, its successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the _____ River at or near _____.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, _____, its successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), be and is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the _____ River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near _____, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of _____, any political subdivision thereof within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of such State governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of _____ years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include goodwill, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion cost, not to exceed 10 percent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 3. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the State of _____, or by any municipality or other political subdivision or public agency thereof, under the provisions of section 2 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed _____ years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 4. The _____, its successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), shall, within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War and with the highway department of the State of _____, a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and at the request of the highway department of the State of _____ shall, at any time within 3 years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said _____, its successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 2 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 5. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to _____, its successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 6. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech delivered by the Secretary of War last night and also to include an address delivered by the Chief of Engineers yesterday before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

IMPORTANCE OF WATER RESOURCES AND PROGRESS OF WATERWAY DEVELOPMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. George H. Dern, Secretary of War, at the annual banquet of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., May 2, 1935:

I have come to discuss our most vital national resource—water. I have come to speak to a body of nonpartisan patriots, determined that our water resources shall be of maximum benefit to our country and contribute to the fullest extent to the well-being of its citizens.

I have come as the sixty-ninth head in lineal succession of one of the three original great Government departments, and the one to which major waterway improvements have always been intrusted, to pledge the utmost in enlightened and energetic prosecution of waterway affairs.

I have come to repeat publicly my pledge to the President that as my Department has been first in war, so it is ready to be first in peace—the spearhead of his drive to eliminate unemployment through the improvement of those water resources which govern all life, and which, of necessity, must be the focal point around which other forms of improvement must be grouped. We have the plans for the work and the engineers to execute it.

I have come as Secretary of War and as an individual, to express my faith in waterway improvements, not merely as a means for relieving unemployment and for reviving the heavy industries, but as a sound addition to our capital equipment, to strengthen our economic structure and to promote social development.

From the earliest ages, waterways have had a critical influence on the development of civilization and the spread of culture. Economic expansion has followed them. From the time, in 1607, when the God-speed, the Susan Constant, and the Discovery sailed up the James River with the dauntless and intrepid band of settlers who founded our country; from the time a few years later when the Mayflower, with its cargo of inspired pioneers first spread its sails in Massachusetts Bay, our civilization has followed our waterways. Even in the conquest of the western plains and mountains, prairie schooners set out only when navigation could be pushed no further inland. And our streams carried our prospectors into the heart of Alaska.

Only with a highly developed and efficient transportation system can a powerful and reliable economic structure be erected and maintained. Our waterways are arteries of such a system. Through our ports come rubber, tin, textiles, spices, machinery, and inventions of other lands which go to make a fuller and better life, and out of them go those products, such as cotton, wheat, cattle, oil, and manufactured articles, on the production of which whole sections of our country depend.

The great rivers with which we are blessed reach inland with their commerce. I sometimes wonder whether our great cities, with their present manifold activities, realize that the waterways have made them what they are, and recognize the important part in the continued growth of those cities which improved waterways have played. The truth of this statement with respect to the great eastern seaboard cities, and in regard to the large cities on the Gulf and on the Pacific coast, is perhaps apparent, but how much credit do the waterways receive for the development and continued prosperity of such inland cities as Pittsburgh, Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, St. Paul, Duluth, Detroit, Memphis, Sacramento, and many others?

Costly forms of transportation in the interior have placed that region at a disadvantage with the coast, and the scope of its economic effort has been curtailed. The farmer pays for the transportation of his products, and he has been paying for this interior disadvantage by the sweat of his brow. The manufacturer has been forced to the seaboard by high freight rates, thus retarding industrial development in the midst of our greatest agricultural area.

I like to think of the great Mississippi not as a dividing line between the East and the West, but as a broad artery of trade connecting the Great Lakes and the Gulf, with arms in the Ohio and Tennessee reaching to the Alleghenies, and in the Missouri and Arkansas tapping the fertile western plains and the slopes of the Rockies—a real bond and link between East and West, North and South, rather than a barrier.

Within a few miles of the Capitol are communities which are almost wholly dependent on waterways for their transportation, and for an outlet to their markets. To deprive our country of its water transportation would paralyze trade and would wholly change our commercial structure. To fail to forge ahead in their improvement or to keep pace with modern requirements would be a breach of public trust.

Our Federal Government is alone empowered to make a comprehensive development of our waterways. It recognizes its responsibilities to the people. Let not selfish interests seek to undermine the edifice which has been erected in our waterway transportation system, as worms boring within the timbers of a ship eventually destroy it.

Our streams are important not alone as carriers of commerce. Even the most hardened of us must drink water occasionally. The general excellence of our water supplies has made for a healthy country, and made possible the concentration of population we now have. Our sanitary engineers are world leaders in their field, and the water works of this country, of which there are good examples here, are unsurpassed.

Water is a dynamic resource. Our coal and oil may become exhausted—already this is predicted—but the waters will flow forever. Water power turned the grist mills which ground our fathers' wheat and corn. Water power developed the factories of New England, the textile industry of the South. Hydroelectric development now permits a diversification of the benefits of stream flow far from the stream itself, and in some places is the sole reliance of a considerable population for light, heat, and power. Our resources in hydro power are unexcelled and only partly developed. Our use of these resources is abreast or ahead of world progress.

In the Far West are regions where the soil is richer, deeper, and more productive than almost anywhere else in the United States, but where nature has been niggardly in providing the life-giving water to make things grow. Where there is no water there is no life. Such spots are a challenge to man's ingenuity in conducting water from afar. He has responded magnificently, and great valleys that were once deserts are now a countryside of smiling fields and orchards, with progressive American communities that form an important market for the products of Eastern manufacturing centers. Irrigation is a sound national policy, and is generally practiced where the people do not know the meaning of the words "marginal" or "submaginal" as applied to land. The development of larger areas may logically be expected, to meet the demands of an expanding or shifting population.

Nature, not always kind in furnishing water, sometimes provides it in too great abundance. In these localities, the fertility of the soil is such that venturesome man invades the regions despite the risk, and hence engineering works of the first magnitude have been required, to save for the Nation those farm lands so necessary for our growing population, and those commercial centers so essential as a market for raw materials and manufactured products.

And when there is the use of lakes and streams for recreational purposes. We are just beginning to learn that those who live the strenuous life must play a little now and then. To furnish the people recreational facilities is a public responsibility and function. By the same token, stream pollution likewise becomes a public problem; and it is one that we ought to face right away.

If proof is necessary, I have said enough to convince even a skeptic that water controls our civilization. What is to be the future of our waterways? In considering this, it should be profitable to review briefly some notable achievements of the past. No doubt, the Chief of Engineers and others who will address you will give details of the work of the War Department which will be of intense interest to you. What I wish to do is merely to call attention, in broad outline, to some major accomplishments.

When your organization was formed in 1901, at the dawn of this century, works for the improvement of our rivers and harbors had progressed from the first few modest undertakings designed to provide for the small carriers in use during the early history of the Republic, to more ambitious and extensive projects in keeping with the requirements of modern shipping and the technical progress which had been made since the days of George Washington and his Potowmack and James Canals. The work had been done progressively and as any prudent individual would conduct his own affairs—according to reasonably prospective needs and the condition of his finances. Where life and health were involved, especially, consideration was given to worthy projects.

As ambitious as some of these projects were for their time, they seem small when viewed in retrospect.

Up to 1900, the War Department had expended some $313,000,000 on waterway improvements, and the total appropriations available for expenditure by the Department during that year did not reach $19,000,000, a sum less than now available to a single Engineer district. With the improvement in our transportation system, some of the earlier projects were outmoded, whilst others were fast becoming more important, and the needs of navigation insistently demanded their enlargement.

Let us glance for a moment at the record of the last 35 years on this, your thirtieth meeting and your thirty-fifth birthday. Since your association was formed, the Panama Canal was begun and completed as an American undertaking—a truly magnificent achievement that stirs the pride of every American. Taken up where others had failed, the work was pushed brilliantly to completion, and has become a model of engineering organization and achievement which the whole world acclaims. The work on the Atlantic Harbors has been less spectacular because it is under water, but it is no less important. These great harbors and entrance channels have been deepened from about 25 feet to from 35 to 40 feet. The important interior link of waterways along the Atlantic coast is now nearing completion, and is of outstanding significance.

The South has developed rapidly, and with the oil fields in the Southwest has added greatly to Gulf commerce, necessitating far-reaching improvements in Gulf ports and connecting waterways. The improvement of the Texas ports, and the vast commerce using them, has come largely since your Congress first met.

The Pacific ports have shared in the general improvement. The Columbia, improved by monumental breakwaters and other works, is substantially a development of the last 35 years. Los Angeles has attained the prominent place it holds as a port and city during this period. San Francisco, with its magnificent inland harbor, has profited by interior channel improvements.

The deepened connecting channels and the harbor improvements on the Great Lakes, together with technical industrial progress, have made possible the development of the greatest interior water commerce in the world, the major part of which has come since the turn of the century. This development points directly to the projected Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway, by means of which ocean commerce may be brought to the heart of the American continent and enormous hydroelectric power resources developed for man's use. How much longer this great, permanent natural resource will be left lying idle I do not know, but I do know that sometime the sister republics of Canada and the United States will develop it as a joint undertaking for their mutual benefit.

The interior rivers have not been neglected, but are now receiving preferential treatment. From a few disconnected stretches where improvements had been begun, the vast Mississippi with its tributaries has been changed during the life of your organization into an integrated system, which will soon permit the operation of boats of uniform draft from the Alleghenies and the Lakes to the Gulf, and even to Kansas City and beyond—the most extensive system of river navigation in the world. The final stages of this improvement are at hand. The upper Mississippi from St. Paul to St. Louis is being transformed by the construction of more than a score of dams into a chain of beautiful lakes, connected by locks and canals, to permit safe and dependable navigation from St. Paul to the Gulf, to say nothing of the recreational value of these bodies of water. The Missouri River is being regulated from its mouth to Sioux City, and the Fort Peck Dam is being constructed to provide ample water for navigation throughout the season. Barge operation between St. Louis and Kansas City will be inaugurated early next month. I am hopeful of securing an allotment of funds sufficient to push the upper Mississippi and the Missouri River projects to early completion.

Works for the control of floods on the lower Mississippi, and on the Sacramento, which were begun in a modest way, largely through local initiative and enterprise, have now been taken over by the Federal Government to a large extent, and have been increased enormously during the period we are considering. Works for the development of power, and the improvement of water supplies, have been undertaken and completed throughout the entire country. Irrigation has made great strides under the efficient direction of the Bureau of Reclamation in the Department of the Interior.

These are significant accomplishments, not abstract theories. The improvements have had, are having, and will have, a far-reaching influence on our cultural, economic, and social life.

I call them to your attention to refresh your memory and to impress you with the increased tempo with which the work has been prosecuted during recent years. It has cost large sums of money, but the expenditures have been commensurate with the importance of the work, the increasing wealth of the country, and, very recently, with the social and economic requirements of the emergency.

Over $2,000,000,000 have now been spent or allotted to vital improvements undertaken by the War Department. Compare this figure with that of 1900. Since that time about 85 percent of the work has been done. Prior to the new relief appropriation of $4,800,000,000, the present administration has allotted about $515,000,000 to this work. This is nearly twice as much as was made available for similar work during the whole century preceding the birth of your organization. Certainly the waterway new deal has been a square deal.

Let us look at the present situation. You are doubtless familiar with the scope and extent of the projects under way; the rapidity with which they were undertaken; the vigor with which work at Fort Peck, Bonneville, the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Muskingum, along the coast, on the Lakes, and elsewhere, is being prosecuted.

Hundreds of millions were allotted, and the work was put under way with astonishing promptness and is being pushed to completion with gratifying speed. Hundreds of thousands of idle men have been given employment and are now engaged on work of this character. Human requirements have been kept in the foreground. Not only those of the individuals have been given consideration, but the rights of contractors have been fairly protected. The Department was the first Government agency to draw contracts in which wages and proper living conditions of employees were safeguarded.

River and harbor improvements have such a high social value, can furnish prompt and wide-spread employment to so many men, and will so stimulate the durable-goods industries that I am sanguine of receiving generous allotments out of the new public-works appropriation. Both the intrinsic merit of waterways projects and their wide-spread benefits insure this.

In the river and harbor bill just passed by the House of Representatives there are 204 projects, 127 of which are new and 77 of which were included to give permanent status to work already completed or under way with emergency funds. I understand that still other projects are being considered by the Senate committee which is handling this bill.

But even the remarkable progress which has led up to the present situation does not represent the last word in the orderly and comprehensive development of our water resources. Many other projects and plans are ready for consideration and adoption when social, financial, and economic conditions demand, and still others are in preparation. As you know, these improvements are not haphazard developments. All projects have been given the most searching investigation prior to their adoption. I say this not only on my own authority but on that of many of your leaders, past and present, who have given the matter consideration.

The War Department, for years, has been a major planning agency. Its place in our national organization requires that. It has made a longer and more extensive study of organization and planning than has any other agency in the country. All forms of industrial activity will find prototypes of their organization in the Department. Industry recognizes these facts, and students have recorded them in their works.

The Department has planned for the future, and is continuing to do so, to the extent that funds and authority are available. The pioneer planning undertaken by the Department was given a major impetus when authority was given and money made available to conduct a comprehensive survey of the streams of the country, as listed in House Document No. 308, Sixty-ninth Congress. This survey, the first and most comprehensive of its kind ever undertaken, has resulted in the accumulation of data of far-reaching importance, and the formulation of plans for 1,600 definite projects. Not only were navigation, power, flood control and irrigation given consideration in these plans, but where these were patently involved with other water uses, those other uses were studied and provision was made for them. The survey is the foundation on which all of our general waterway plans have been formulated. It is alive. Plans are being kept abreast of the times, and developed to meet changing social and economic conditions and the reasonably prospective needs of the future. A summary or index of the reports of this survey has been mimeographed and is available to you.

The War Department is most fortunate in being able to number among its friends and supporters, an organization such as yours, which is devoted to the rational development of our paramount national asset. In bringing before the Congress, the Administration, and the War Department, worthy projects for inclusion in our national waterways plan, in presenting local views, and most important of all, in assisting in the crystallizations of national opinion, you have rendered a signal service to your homes, your States, and your country. Under its present officers, and with the leadership and Membership of your Congress, I feel confident that even greater accomplishments will be possible in the future.

The work before us involves the solution of problems which are too important to be intrusted to any group except one composed of professional men, who, by training and lifelong experience, are qualified to render the country a high order of service, and who are uninfluenced by sectional or professional jealousies and personal ambitions. The task is too vast and too important to be given to those having only local or theoretical experience, or whose experience is limited to some special phase of waterway development.

The Department recognizes its responsibilities in the matter of waterway development. That stern and accomplished old Roman, Julius Frontinus, fresh from triumphs on the battlefields, when made curator of waters by the Emperor Nerva, in the year 97 A. D., expressed his sense of honor at the appointment by recording in his memoirs that his duties "from olden time, have been exercised only by the most distinguished citizens." As in the mighty Roman Empire, so in this mighty country has the task of handling our waters been intrusted to the most distinguished citizens. Five former Presidents of the United States and the only President of the Confederacy were given the task of improving our waterways. Some of our great soldiers, like Frontinus of old, who won battles for his emperor in Spain and Britain, have been engaged upon our waterway improvements. Lee and Meade, Beauregard and Humphreys, Goethals and Sibert have earned enduring fame as soldiers and as engineers.

There are men among the Army Engineers today with the same high ability, integrity, and zeal, and who, moreover, are inspired by these famous former members of their corps to perform even greater service for the country if the opportunity is given them.

The War Department, with over a century of experience in every type of waterway development, with not only the experience, but with a record of probity and achievement unrivaled by any other engineering organization in the world, will be devoted in the future, as in the past, to planning and executing the works which you have so close at heart.

The Army in this country has never started any of the Nation's wars but has finished them all successfully. Its victories in peace have been no less renowned than in war, and it glories as much in its economic achievements as it does in seeing the serried ranks returning home in triumph from the battlefield.

The Army accepts the challenge of the depression. We are ready to forge ahead on the President's program of ending misery and of providing the country with enduring improvements.

I know we can count on your continued enthusiastic cooperation. Let your accomplishments in the past be but the prelude to still greater service in the future.

DEVELOPMENTS IN WATERWAY IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Maj. Gen. E. M. Markham, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, in Washington, and to the country by Nation-wide radio broadcast over the system of the National Broadcasting Co., May 2, 1935:

Mr. President and gentlemen, it is a great privilege to have the opportunity again to appear before the membership of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, and to speak briefly of the developments in waterway improvements since your last annual meeting, particularly since the influence of your Congress has been an important one in the comprehensive and intelligent improvement program for utilizing to the best advantage the great natural assets afforded by our national waterways.

Last year, I told you that prior to 1928, the annual appropriation for the maintenance and improvement of our rivers and harbors had averaged from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000, and for flood control, about $10,000,000, and that in the 5 years preceding the National Industrial Recovery Act, approximately $400,000,000 was expended on rivers and harbors, and $158,000,000 on flood control. When I addressed you last year, there had been received as a part of the augmented budget for emergency relief, $250,000,000 for application to rivers and harbors and flood control. That amount has been increased until, at the present time, a total of $356,000,000 has been received for the purposes stated. These funds have practically all been obligated. Of the river and harbor funds made available from the National Industrial Recovery Act, there remains unexpended but $15,000,000 or about 4 percent. These resources have made possible a major contribution to employment relief and a noteworthy advance in the development of our waterways.

The record of the first year of our emergency expenditures, in the preparation of plans and specifications and in speedily placing the work under way, has been continued as a consequence of which, I feel it my duty to speak gratefully again of the enthusiastic and loyal efforts of my organization in the purpose that the emergency program should be successful.

As allotments were necessarily influenced by the need for providing employment, a number of projects urgently demanded by navigation have not been included in the emergency works authorized. The funds, however, have permitted the initiation of a number of major projects which will be completed when additional allotments are made. Some of the more important enterprises on which material progress is in evidence, but for which more funds are required for completion, are the Delaware River from Philadelphia to Trenton, the Intracoastal Waterway along the Atlantic coast, the canalization project for the upper Mississippi River, the regulation program for the Missouri River, and the construction of the Fort Peck Reservoir. The Bonneville Dam, the replacement program on the Kanawha River, the completion of the channels in the Great Lakes, the enlargement of the Cape Cod Canal, further work in Tampa, Miami, Boston, Sabine-Neches Waterway, the Louisiana-Texas Intracoastal Waterway, and several of the important Great Lakes ports will likewise require further funds.

This Department has prepared a comprehensive program, which, in addition to the completion of these projects, provides for continuing work on the projects hitherto authorized by Congress, or recommended to Congress, and included in the river and harbor bill recently passed by the House of Representatives and now before the Senate. Preliminary plans and specifications are well advanced for all of these improvements and the Department is prepared to place them under way as rapidly as funds become available. Their completion will insure that with the end of the depression and the inevitable commercial expansion which will follow, our waterways will be prepared to meet the demands of navigation and to play their usual important part in the maintenance of prosperity.

The emergency relief appropriations have also provided funds for certain flood-control projects. These funds have been applied only to projects authorized by Congress, to those combined with other improvements, or where the local interests have contributed in large part to the project. These developments include the authorized flood-control plan for the Mississippi River, that for the Sacramento River, and the comprehensive plan for the Muskingum Conservancy District. On the Muskingum, our Department is acting as the construction agency in providing 14 flood-control reservoirs under a contractual agreement between the Administration of Public Works and the Conservancy District. The district pays approximately one-third of the cost. The Fort Peck and Tygart Dams will be of material value to flood control, although both of these reservoirs are designed primarily to augment low-water flow for navigation purposes.

The comprehensive surveys and investigations undertaken by the Engineer Department have developed a large number of meritorious flood-control projects, many of which are needed to reduce the enormous damages resulting from periodic high water. These flood-control projects provide for relief by the use of reservoirs, levees, stream clearing, and cut-offs. This work is of a type peculiarly adapted to performance by relief labor. It can be placed under way with a minimum of delay, and it is distributed over a large territory. Though it is true that the benefits from some projects are largely local, the collective effect of the work will be Nation-wide owing to its suitability as a relief measure and its wide-spread distribution.

A list of the more meritorious of these projects is ready for consideration by constituted authority as a part of the Emergency Relief program. The data on hand in the Department, which covers virtually the entire country, will enable it to report promptly on plans for additional flood control. The execution of flood-control projects will be of tremendous value to agriculture as well as to large and small communities, and in many cases will remove actual hazards not only to property but to human life. It is reasonably certain that such projects will not involve future maintenance or expenditures by the Government, because their inherent value to local communities are such that they will undoubtedly be more than willing to assume the responsibility for future maintenance of these works.

I wish that I were able at this time to set out for your information the waterway program which may be expected under the recent work-relief appropriation. However, the administration has clearly shown in its allocation of over $355,000,000 to these improvements, its recognition of their merit and of their importance to our national development. Already a tentative program for the coming year has been placed before the proper division of the National Emergency Council, and undoubtedly it is now receiving serious consideration by that agency.

I feel confident that an expanded program will result, and I can assure you that such a program will be prosecuted with the same careful attention to design and supervision, with the same dispatch, and with the same success as the projects already under way or completed.

From time immemorial people of all lands have used their waterways to transport all kinds of commerce. The simple necessities of life are dependent upon low-cost water transportation. In modern times these necessities rely upon up-to-date facilities on our waterways.

In America, our natural water resources are particularly abundant. We are greatly favored by nature, and this is, in itself, a compelling reason for their improvement and development. We must constantly plan for the future, and we must be abreast or ahead of the times in the execution of our plans.

Let me assure you that we have looked far ahead, and that we are ready to execute our plans as fast as there is demand for new and improved facilities, and as the authority and funds for their construction become available. Although this planning is already thorough and far reaching, we realize that eternal vigilance must be exercised to maintain step with changing conditions and in readiness to meet the unforeseen.

Let me say that the War Department has worked with you to plan and accomplish the best results for the country. Our waterborne commerce in 1929 reached a peak of 584,000,000 tons, valued at $24,000,000,000. During the low point of the economic depression the annual tonnage dropped to 342,000,000 tons, valued at $11,000,000,000. In 1933 our records show this tonnage to have increased to 394,000,000 tons, valued at $12,600,000,000. All indications are that 1934 will show a further increase, and that within a few years the peak tonnage of 1929 will be greatly surpassed. We are optimistic. We believe prosperity to be definitely in sight. With its return, we expect to have actual waterway improvements ready to serve prosperity, as plans and organizations were available to fight the depression.

Moreover, we look forward to working in harmony with you as time goes on to secure greater and greater prosperity for the Nation, by reason of its waterway improvements and the ever-increasing commerce and plenty which results from such improvements.

You have accomplished much in the past. With your wider membership and your forceful and energetic leadership I foresee a bright future for you and for the accomplishment of the constructive ends to which you have dedicated yourselves.

I am grateful for the attention which you have accorded my remarks.

GRAND HAVEN LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATION, MICH.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I call up the bill (H. R. 4239) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to convey to the city of Grand Haven, Mich., certain portions of the Grand Haven Lighthouse Reservation, Mich., and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to convey to the city of Grand Haven, State of Michigan, for use for street purposes, certain portions of the Grand Haven Lighthouse Reservation, Mich., which are not required to be retained for lighthouse purposes. The Secretary of Commerce shall describe by metes and bounds in the deed of conveyance the exact portions of the reservation transferred. The deed of conveyance shall also contain a provision that should the city of Grand Haven, State of Michigan, cease to use the property for the purpose for which it is conveyed, title thereto shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 2. The United States reserves the rights-of-way over, underground, or across the area to be transferred for any use whatsoever in conducting the Lighthouse Service or other activities of the Government, and, further reserves the right to be furnished by the city of Grand Haven, any and all services, conveniences, and utilities at established rates, such as transportation, gas or electric lighting facilities, water connections and sewer connections, and such other utilities as may be installed in the vicinity of and accessible to the reservation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CORN-HOG PROGRAM

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD dealing with the Federal processing tax.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to confine my time to the corn-hog program, laying special emphasis on the processing tax as it affects the recovery program and builds for future security for the farm and farmers. I find that everyone who makes a study of just what the Agricultural Adjustment Act is doing for the preservation of the farmers and our farms is very enthusiastic about it. The trouble is that 99 out of every 100 who speak on or about the actual application of this act do not know the facts. A small percent of destructive critics can always be found when a new procedure is set up in any field.

Mr. Speaker, we always find the demagogues playing on the sympathy of the unfortunate. This has been especially true during the last session, when the opponents of the administration, or, in reality, the opponents of the farmer, laborer, and little business man, shed crocodile tears in telling of the pigs that were killed.

I am sorry to say that many of these same fellows who shed these crocodile tears because some pigs were killed by the Government to bring about purchasing power are the same fellows that criticize the workings of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It is this same group of destructive critics who destroyed the banks and credit of the Nation and put us on the rocks in 1929. Now, when they see we are going to come out of the depression and give back to the farmers, laborer, and little business man another hold they again cry.

Therefore, I wish to tell you just how the Agricultural Adjustment Act has worked to the advantage of all concerned since it was put into operation.

I wish to make a few remarks in my time today concerning the character and results of the agricultural-adjustment programs pertaining to livestock and feed grains. In recent weeks we have heard a great deal of loose talk about the effects of these programs. We have heard the Adjustment Administration charged with wanton destruction of food and with extreme disregard of the public interest. We have heard the Adjustment Administration blamed for the current shortage of feed and the temporary over-reduction in hogs, which really was caused by the drought. The recent rise in retail prices of meats has been hailed as extraordinarily exorbitant, and, of course, the administration has come in for a large share of blame. It has been said that the farm-adjustment program not only has robbed the poor and the needy of necessary food, but that it has destroyed the farmers' foreign market for livestock products, and has resulted in flooding the country with imports of both meats and grains.

Now what are the facts? Unlike some commentators who pose as authorities on this subject of agricultural adjustment, I have taken the trouble to find out a little bit about what actually has been going on. I find, as I suspected, that much of what is being said publicly about the livestock- and crop-control programs is not based on fact. As a consequence, there is misunderstanding and ignorance of considerable extent on the part of the public regarding the adjustment activities. It seems appropriate, therefore, to discuss the present livestock and feed-grain situation in full view of the facts and in recognition of the popular misunderstandings.

Thus far in the livestock and feed-grain field there have been adjustments only in corn acreage and in the numbers of hogs, cattle, and sheep. The effort to control corn and hog production under the Agricultural Adjustment Act has followed along two lines: First, removal of surpluses on hand at the outset through emergency purchases of pigs, sows, and market hogs, and of hog products, all for relief distribution; second, the sign-up of over a million farmers to hold corn acreage and hog farrowings thereafter at more moderate levels. The adjustment in cattle and sheep numbers was made through the Government's drought-relief buying program during the summer and fall of 1934.

There are several things about these programs that I wish to emphasize:

First. All of them have been largely based on recommendations of farmers themselves, not foisted on farmers as so often claimed.

Second. The products of the several emergency slaughter activities actually were used, either for edible or inedible purposes and not utterly wasted as so often charged.

Third. The amount of feed available per farm animal and the volume of livestock available for slaughter during the current season is larger, not smaller, than if no adjustment program had been in effect.

Fourth. The sharp reduction in production, part of which occurred as a result of the Agricultural Adjustment programs, has not resulted in a really significant increase in imports of livestock and feed grains.

Fifth. While meat supplies during the current year will be shorter than for some time, they will be ample and should begin to increase following the next harvest of feed grains.

Sixth. There are good and sufficient reasons for undertaking control of livestock and feed-grain production.

When the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed in May 1933 the corn-hog situation was extremely acute. The average farm price of hogs in the United States was only around $3 per hundredweight, as compared with the farm price of nearly $12 per hundredweight for the same period in 1926 and an average of $7.22 per hundredweight for the 1910–14 period. The United States average farm price for corn in early 1933 was only about 25 cents per bushel, as compared with approximately 70 cents for the same period in 1926 and an average of 64.2 cents per bushel in the 1910–14 period. In my own State of Pennsylvania hogs at the farm in the spring of 1933 were bringing only about $4 per hundredweight. In the North Central States, where the bulk of the commercial supply of corn and hogs is grown, farm prices of hogs averaged considerably less.

At the same time farmers were paying for commodities bought at an average price even higher than they had paid in the pre-war period. Obviously immediate action to raise corn and hog prices was essential. Both corn and hogs had less than one-half of their pre-war purchasing power. In fact, for a part of the time in the winter of 1932–33 corn had scarcely more than one-fifth of its pre-war purchasing power. It was so cheap that farmers in the Corn Belt actually used it for fuel.

This severe disparity between corn-hog prices and the prices farmers pay, as has often been explained, was due primarily to excess production. Restoration of hog production in European countries after the war to a point well above their pre-war output and the sharp increase of trade barriers after 1929 caused such a decline in our exports of pork and lard that a heavier and heavier load was thrown on the domestic market. Our exports of pork and lard dropped from an average of around 2,000,000,000 pounds in the early post-war years to slightly more than 700,000,000 pounds in 1932. Where the American farmer averaged 20 foreign customers for pork in the 1926–29 period, he had only 8 left in 1932; and where he had 40 foreign customers for lard during the same predepression period, there were less than 30 in 1932.

Unhappily, there was no proportionate adjustment in hog production as our export trade fell off. Instead, hog production in the United States continued to increase at about the same rate as the country's population. Lower prices were inevitable. When the supply of a commodity tends to increase in the face of declining demand, the value must fall.

Of course, the level of hog prices would have fallen to some extent during the depression in company with the drop in all prices. But the excess of hog products in the domestic market resulting from the slump in foreign trade caused hog prices to fall more than the prices of other products.

Mr. Speaker, it has been rather difficult for the American people to comprehend the corn-hog surplus because the excess of hogs, unlike the excesses of some other commodities such as cotton, did not pile up in warehouses. Pork is a relatively perishable product, and has to be kept moving through to consumers as rapidly as possible for whatever it will bring. Even products adaptable to storage are seldom held through a second season. Thus, the surplus in hog production was almost entirely reflected in the disparity between hog prices and the prices of things farmers buy.

Now, as I have said, the hog situation in the late spring and early summer of 1933 warranted immediate action. The number of hogs already farrowed and fattening was large. Moreover, the 1933 spring pig crop was 4 percent larger than the spring crop of the year before, and according to the Government survey on June 1, a substantial increase was expected in the number of sows to farrow in the fall. Yet, demand for hog products, particularly in the foreign markets, had not improved. Storage stocks of pork and lard were abnormally large. It seemed certain that without an emergency adjustment of some sort, hog prices during the winter of 1933–34 would be very low, possibly even lower than during the winter of 1932–33.

On July 18, 1933, these State groups gathered at Des Moines, Iowa, and organized the National Corn-Hog Producers Committee of 25. This national committee was delegated by the conference of producer representatives to advise directly with the Secretary of Agriculture and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration on means of effectuating the necessary adjustment of hog numbers.

The first action of the national committee in the summer of 1933 was to review in conference with Agricultural Adjustment Administration officials the serious economic outlook for hogs. Then, at a public hearing early in August, they outlined a pig- and sow-buying program and urged its immediate adoption by the administration as an emergency adjustment measure. I repeat, it was the representatives of the producers who urged the pig- and sow-buying program.

Mr. Speaker, I quote in part from this committee's recommendation as follows:

> We find very definite and substantial increases in the production of hogs, both as to number and tonnage, taking place while at the same time a substantial decrease in normal outlets, both in the export and domestic markets, obtain. If such a condition is to be met, it must necessarily call for what ordinarily might be termed "drastic measures."
> To meet this situation, we recommend the removal from the domestic market of 500,000,000 pounds of pork and pork products between now and January 1, 1934, and a total of 2,000,000,000 pounds during the coming marketing year by any one or a combination of the following methods: (a) Encouraging the marketing of 4,000,000 pigs from 25 to 100 pounds average weight between August 15 an October 1; and (b) inducing the immediate marketing of 1,000,000 sows about 275 pounds in weight, soon to farrow, by offering a premium of $4 per head plus the removal of the usual dockage.
> It is proposed to dispose of the resulting meat and meat products from the best of these animals by the sale on a moderate basis to relief agencies under definite agreements that their normal purchases of meat will be reduced. The balance of the lower grades of meat resulting from this type of marketing should be condemned, tanked, and such salvage realized therefrom as would be possible without serious inconvenience or injury to the usual demand for this type of product.

That completes the quotation from a part of the recommendation for an emergency pig and sow marketing program made to the Secretary of Agriculture by the corn-hog committee of 25.

The buying of pigs and sows at market premiums began as scheduled on August 23, 1933, and continued for a little more than 5 weeks thereafter. I call your attention to the fact that this emergency program, commonly known as the little-pig program, terminated in the fall of 1933 and has not been in effect since that time, as many people seem to believe. The purchases were made by authorized meat packers in 80 processing points over the country, and finally totaled 6,200,000 pigs and about 220,000 sows due to farrow. The sale of sows lagged beyond the original objective of 1,000,000 head, but the sale of pigs was increased to nearly 50 percent over the original objective on account of drought conditions in the Dakotas and nearby territory.

The heavy pigs—that is, those weighing between 80 and 100 pounds—together with the sows, were converted into dry salt pork for distribution to needy families. Altogether, about 100,000,000 pounds of pork were produced. It was distributed by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration throughout the United States and in several insular possessions.

The light pigs were unsuitable for economical processing into meat on account of their smallness, and therefore were converted into grease and fertilizer tankage. A little over 5,000 tons of tankage and 10,000 tons of grease were produced and stored. These products were sold to highest bidders late in the fall of 1933 for a little more than $600,000.

When a shortage of storage space developed during the buying program some of the tank residue remaining after the rendering of grease from the pig carcasses had to be disposed of immediately instead of being manufactured into fertilizer tankage and stored. Depending upon their own situations, the processors, under contract, used various methods of disposal. In some cases the tank residue was given free to farmers. In other cases it was hauled away and dumped in places where such dumping was permissible, or otherwise disposed of.

Mr. Speaker, it was this dumping of a part of the low-value tank residue which gave rise to many fantastic and wholly false stories. Critics of the adjustment program, overlooking the real purpose of the emergency slaughter, played upon the sympathy of people for young animals, quite forgetting that the pigs were destined to die sooner or later from a thrust of the butcher's knife. These critics accused the administration of wholesale destruction of food, disregarding the fact that a large part of the slaughter produced dry salt pork for needy families, while the rest was largely utilized for inedible purposes. They ignored the fact that pork supplies following the emergency slaughter would be entirely ample for the usual needs, while prices to farmers would be stronger. It was stated that live pigs and sows with unborn pigs in them were mercilessly tossed into rivers or incinerators. Actually, every pig and sow was required to be processed either for edible or inedible uses, according to specifications of the Government. The processing operations were subject to both antemortem and postmortem inspection by inspectors of the United States Department of Agriculture. From the standpoint of public interest, there is quite a difference between the actual nature of the emergency program and the groundless allegations of wanton destruction made by the critics.

The pig- and sow-buying program obviously was a makeshift device, but it fulfilled its purpose by maintaining hog prices a year ago this winter at a substantially higher level than otherwise would have been the case. Its net benefit to the hog market considerably exceeded its net cost of around $30,000,000. In addition to providing meat for poor families the emergency program served as timely drought relief for farmers in the Dakotas and adjoining territory who were forced to sell their hogs on account of feed shortage. It also permitted for the country as a whole the savings of sixty to seventy million bushels of corn that otherwise would have been fed. These savings eventually helped materially in relieving the general drought situation in the summer and fall of 1934.

During the latter part of 1933 and the fore part of 1934 the little-pig program was supplemented by additional purchases for relief distribution of about 1,400,000 market hogs, and of approximately 92,000,000 pounds of hog products, the equivalent of about 600,000 market hogs. These supplemental operations, by reducing the volume of hog products available through regular trade channels, tended further to support hog prices during weeks when marketings were heavy. They were conducted principally during January and February 1934 and were discontinued in May. The supplemental purchase operations, like the little-pig program, continued to influence hog prices to some extent until the late summer of 1934.

The first really fundamental plan for raising corn and hog prices under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, however, was the 1934 corn-hog adjustment contract brought out late in the fall of 1933. This program provided control of the number of producing units; that is, the acreage in corn and the number of sows farrowing, whereas the buying program only made emergency adjustment of excessive hogs and hog products already in existence.

As was the case in the little-pig program, the 1934 adjustment contract was largely based on the recommendations of producer representatives. It was decided to call for reductions by the individual contract signer of not less than 20 percent of the average corn acreage for the preceding 2 years, 1932–33, and of 25 percent in the number of hogs produced for market from litters farrowed during the same period. Reductions in both corn and hogs were asked under a single contract in recognition of the close relationship between the production of the two commodities and because serious business administrative difficulties would have been involved in handling separate contracts for corn and hogs.

The extent of the producers' participation in the 1934 contract sign-up was extensive. In the Middle West, where the bulk of the corn and hogs are grown, more than 80 percent of the annual average production was brought under contract. For the country as a whole the control was extended to about 60 percent of the corn production and between 70 and 75 percent of the hog production. The grand total of the contracts represented about 1,155,000 farms scattered over the 48 States. As a matter of fact, the corn-hog program is the largest of all control programs under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It covers more territory and involves the largest number of farmers.

Mr. Speaker, participation of farmers in the 1934 corn-hog program was entirely voluntary. If a farmer did not want to come in, he did not have to. He could simply forfeit the benefit payments for which he was eligible and elect to run his business on any production level that he might choose. Corn-hog farmers have that same alternative under the new program for 1935 now being put into effect. But this year, as last year, the large majority of corn-hog producers here recognized the wisdom of controlled production and again have signed up about a million contracts.

A noteworthy feature of the corn-hog program is the organization of county control associations, through which farmers themselves carry out the program details. A farmer becomes a member of the association by signing the corn-hog contract, and he has a vote in election of community committeemen who compose the association's board of directors. There are approximately 2,185 county corn-hog control associations throughout the United States today. It is estimated that there are about 20,000 community committees and about 75,000 community committeemen. These committeemen receive some compensation for services rendered, but the total amount of expenses has been moderate. The budget for committee work and equipment within each county is determined by the board of directors for its own control association.

The group consciousness being developed among farmers in these control associations may well be worth much more in the long run than all current finanical results in dollars and cents. In spite of the fact that it is one of the largest branches of all agriculture, the corn-hog industry has until this year always lacked in unity of interest.

Now, what has been the result of the 1934 corn-hog program? The proof of the pudding, they say, is in the eating. First, let us take a look at the effects of production; then we may check on changes in prices and total income.

Hog numbers were very sharply reduced in 1934. The surpluses were completely eliminated. The number of hogs on farms dropped from a little over 57,000,000 head to about 37,000,000 head during the year; that is, by a little over 20,000,000 head. The fact is we had something of an overreduction in hogs. The expected slaughter of hogs for 1935, most of which will be derived from 1934 litters, is not expected to exceed 30,000,000 head as compared with the normal inspected slaughter volume of around 47,500,000 head.

Not all of this decrease, however, was due to the corn-hog program. The temporary overreduction can be attributed to the drought. The aggregate hog adjustment represented by the 1934 contract was approximately 13,000,000 head; the remaining seven-million-odd head in the total hog reduction occurring during 1934 was largely due to the feed shortage occasioned by the drought in some sections in 1933, and by the general drought in 1934.

It is often charged that if the corn-hog program had not been in effect our production of pork and lard this year would have been larger than it is. Well, as Secretary Wallace has pointed out several times, it simply is not so. I know it is hard to believe, but we actually have more feed for animals and more meat for humans as a result of the 1934 adjustment programs than we would have had under uncontrolled conditions, for certain reasons:

First. The little-pig program helped make an adjustment in advance of the drought which resulted in from sixty to seventy million bushels of corn being carried forward to the 1934 feeding season. If the pigs had been fed out, they would have gone to market as finished hogs in the winter of 1933–34, they would have demoralized the hog-price situation, and they would not have augmented in any way the present supply of pork. The products resulting from the slaughter of the pigs as finished hogs would have been consumed long before this time.

Second. A supplement to the little-pig program in this advance adjustment was the Government's corn-loan program which resulted in the selling of 270,000,000 bushels of corn, thus encouraging more conservative feeding in the winter of 1933–34 and increasing the supply available for summer and fall of 1934 when it was greatly needed.

Third. The adjustment in 1934 farrowings under the contract helped effectuate a further material reduction in hog numbers in advance of the drought. Again the result was more available feed during the 1934–35 feeding season than otherwise would have been the case.

Meanwhile, during the summer of 1934, all of the various adjustment contracts were liberalized by the administration to permit the production of emergency feed crops. This resulted in the planting of emergency crops or the utilization of crops already planted for soil-building or erosion-preventing purposes on approximately thirty-six and one-half million contracted acres in the cotton-, wheat-, corn-, and tobacco-producing regions. This emergency production more than offset the amount of corn that might have been raised on the land taken out of corn by the adjustment program.

If the entire 13,000,000 acres set aside under the 1934 corn-hog contract had been in corn under last year's conditions, they would have produced less than 200,000,000 bushels. The average yield of corn in the United States in 1934 was 15.8 bushels per acre as compared with a normal average of about 26 bushels per acre. The drop in acre yield was particularly sharp in the western Corn Belt where many of the contracted acres were located. The total area planted to corn in the United States in 1934—that is, about 92½ million acres—produced under the severe drought conditions about 1,380,000,000 bushels. Had normal weather prevailed this adjusted planted acreage would have produced about 2,250,000,000 bushels of corn; that is, nearly 1,000,000,000 additional bushels. This volume would have been entirely ample for reserve storage and for 1934–35 requirements in view of the adjustment being asked simultaneously in hog farrowings.

This is not to suggest that the experience in 1934 has proved acreage control is ineffectual. A substantial change in acreage is a minor factor in the change of total production during a drought year, but, in event of normal weather, acreage control very effectively prevents surplus production, and would have done so under usual conditions during the past year.

Mr. Speaker, if there had not been advance adjustments in farrowings, we would have had a surplus situation in hogs similar to the one that developed in the cattle industry.

Another emergency-buying program would have been necessary. Thousands of farmers could not have maintained as many breeding animals as they now have on hand. Much valuable feed would have been virtually wasted producing pigs that could not possibly be fed out on account of feed shortage. Even with the advance adjustment in farrowings under the 1934 program, the liquidation of pigs last summer was rather severe in certain localities.

In the case of cattle, as you will recall, drought-relief buying did become absolutely necessary. At the time the drought struck, cattle numbers were the largest in many years. Moreover, they were in poor condition; good pasture was scarce and feed supplies were low on account of the short crop the season before. There was a particularly large accumulation of cows and heifers on farms and ranches. Market receipts of cattle for slaughter also were increasing. Naturally cattle prices were very low. Even before drought conditions developed, representatives of the cattle producers were considering plans for effecting an adjustment in numbers.

When drought conditions grew so serious as to demand immediate action, Congress enacted the Jones-Connally amendment to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, under which the sum of $150,000,000 became available for cattle purchases. Some money also was made available for emergency purchases from the Emergency Appropriation Act.

Actual buying operations were begun early in June 1934 and were continued until along in early 1935. Initial purchases were largely confined to areas in Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wisconsin. With the rapid spread of the drought, however, and with the designation of additional drought areas, purchase operations were gradually extended until they were under way in 24 States of the West and Middle West. At the close of the buying on February 1, 1935, the Government had bought 8,296,398 head at a total cost of $111,778,192. The average price paid per animal was about $13.48.

Between 80 and 85 percent of the animals bought—that is, about 6,811,813 head—were fit for food, and the meat from them was canned for relief distribution. Approximately 1,476,500 head, however, were in such bad shape as a result of feed and water shortage that they were condemned as unfit for shipment and were destroyed on the farms. Accredited agents in the field appraised the animals offered for sale, and field representatives of the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation accepted delivery and made shipments of the cattle for slaughter under State projects and Federal contracts. State directors in charge of cattle purchases were instructed to give priority to the areas in most distressed conditions, but not to extend purchases from individual producers beyond the number absolutely necessary. In recognition of the necessity for maintaining breeding stock in important breeding areas, much effort was made to keep liquidation at the lowest possible level consistent with the short feed situation.

The cattle-buying program, like the little-pig program, came in for a good deal of unfounded criticism. It was said that the carcasses of thousands of animals were unnecessarily wasted. As I have pointed out, only those animals too emaciated for shipment and slaughter were destroyed. The bulk of the purchases were converted into canned beef, all of which is being distributed through relief agencies. Thus the cattle slaughtered were utilized in noncommercial channels and were kept out of the glutted markets. As a result, prices for commercial cattle during the summer and fall months were much higher than they otherwise would have been. Excepting for the Government's purchase program, the relatively large volume of cattle moving from the drought-stricken areas undoubtedly would have driven prices below the point at which these prices could offset freight and other marketing costs.

I have said that sheep numbers also were adjusted under the Government's 1934 drought-relief program. The buying of sheep got under way early in September. As in the case of cattle, these purchases were confined to emergency drought counties. About 2,000,000 animals were bought for the account of the Government, and of these about 60 percent had to be condemned as unfit for use.

A consequence of wide general interest, resulting from the material change in supplies of livestock as a result of the drought and adjustment programs, has been the advance in livestock and meat prices. Likewise corn prices have increased materially since early 1934.

The average farm price of hogs during the first 3 months of this year was about $7.35 per hundredweight, or more than double the price received during the first 3 months of last year. To put it another way, hog prices during the first quarter of this year averaged within 80 percent of the fair exchange value based on pre-war price relationships, whereas they averaged but slightly more than 40 percent of this value before adjustment in supplies got under way.

Lamb prices have not advanced as much as hog prices, because sheep numbers, even with the drought liquidation, still are above the 1929 level and also above the average of the past 10 years. During the first quarter of 1935 lambs at the farm sold for an average of about $6.50 per hundredweight as compared with an average of about $6.28 per hundredweight for the same period a year ago.

Mr. Speaker, cattle prices, on the other hand, have increased materially. They clearly show the effects of adjustment. The average price for beef cattle at the farm during the first quarter of 1935 was $5.85 per hundredweight as compared with an average of $3.60 per hundredweight during the same quarter in 1934, an advance of 60 percent.

I doubt if the average person realizes the marked improvement that has taken place in livestock prices since a year ago. My own State of Pennsylvania does not produce a large number of hogs, but nevertheless, it has been benefiting substantially from the rise. The average farm price of hogs in Pennsylvania during the first 3 months of this year was $7.85 per hundredweight, or nearly 70 percent higher than last year. This price rise is of particular significance to hog farmers in the eastern part of the country where herds were not as severely affected by the drought as herds in the Western States.

Of course, meat prices during recent months have advanced to some extent as a consequence of smaller livestock supplies, but they are not abnormally out of line by comparison with prices of other things. From 1929 to 1933 meat prices declined about 65 percent, while the average price of all foods was declining about 35 percent, and the average price of nonagricultural products was declining only about 16 percent. During the first 3 months of 1935 livestock prices were about 75 percent higher than for the year 1933, but were 32 percent lower than in 1929. At the same time prices of nonagricultural products during the first 3 months of 1935 were within 16 percent of their 1929 level, and the wages of industrial workers were within about 20 percent of 1929.

The real criterion of the value of the adjustment program to farmers, however, is its influence on total income. Farmers need not only a higher price but a larger total return. As I have already pointed out, the purchasing power of corn and hogs was extremely low at the beginning of 1933, lower than that of almost all other farm commodities.

I find upon investigation that the farm income from hogs in the United States during 1934 was about $144,000,000 larger, or about 28 percent greater, than in 1933, and approximately $214,000,000 larger, or about 50 percent greater, than in 1932. It is estimated by the Department of Agriculture that farmers last year received a total of $493,925,000 from the sale of hogs, and a total of $159,154,000 in corn-hog payments, making a grand total of $653,079,000 for the year.

Prices of things farmers buy also have shown some advance during the past 2 years, but not to the same extent as hog prices and income. The 1934 index of prices paid by farmers was 123 percent of the prewar—1910–14—level, as compared with an index of 109 for 1933 and 107 for 1932. If we make an allowance for this rise in the prices of things farmers buy, we still find a substantial net increase in 1934 hog income.

The increase in livestock income resulting from the adjustment of production is in accordance with past experience.

The income from corn and hogs under the adjustment program comes to the farmers in two parts: First, in direct return from the sale of the commodity at the open market price, and, second, in the benefit payments derived from processing taxes on corn and hogs. The larger part of the tax collections are derived from hogs, since hogs consume nearly one-half of the annual corn crop. Only a small part of the remaining portion of the corn crop enters into industrial trade channels where it can be reached by the processing levy.

At the close of 1934 the Bureau of Internal Revenue reported a total receipt of $175,616,013.35 in processing and related taxes collected on hogs and $8,182,113.63 in processing and related taxes collected on corn. These collections, however, did not represent all of the money due as of the period beginning with the date the corn and hog taxes became effective—November 5, 1933—and closing December 31, 1934. Assessment of the processors for any given month are not made until the month following, and in some cases payments may be extended under the law for as long as 180 days.

The emergency purchases of hogs and hog products for relief distribution, and the 1934 and 1935 corn and hog adjustment payments will require a continuation of the corn-hog processing taxes through three marketing years ending November 4, 1936. The current rates are $2.25 per hundredweight on hogs and 5 cents per bushel on corn. It is expected that the collections during the first 2 years will be required to meet the cost of the emergency purchases and to supply funds for payments under the 1934 contract.

Benefits under the 1934 program, part of which were paid in 1934 and part of which are now being paid this year, will amount in total to about $314,000,000. Most of this amount has now been sent out to the farmers. The disbursement total on April 27 was nearly $280,000,000. Benefits under the 1935 program, now being put into effect, probably will amount to around $165,000,000.

The benefit payments made to cooperating producers are not gifts from the Federal Government; they are not awarded to farmers for not having grown hogs and corn, and they are not damage payments for losses in any past period. They are intended as simply the cooperating producers' share of the larger total farm income that is possible through sound control of production. Without the processing-tax benefit payment principle the men who did the most adjusting of production would see all the benefits go to the men who had an unchanged or, perhaps, a larger volume for sale.

Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act a fair share of the increase in price and income resulting from adjustment is saved for the cooperating farmer by means of a processing tax and is distributed to him in the form of benefit payments. At the same time the noncooperating farmer gets some advantage from the market rise in the open-market price. For example, many farmers in my own State did not elect to participate in the corn-hog program but they have been materially benefited by the doubling of hog prices during the past year.

Mr. Speaker, a lot of wild stories have been circulated about benefit payments. The statement is frequently made that many persons are receiving corn-hog checks who never produced hogs or corn. This charge is false. Under the agricultural-adjustment program no person can receive a benefit payment check without first signing a contract to adjust his production, and, excepting in the case of new producers, he is not eligible to sign a contract unless he has a production record for the historical base period.

In scattered cases, payments were made under the 1934 program to contract signers who, for one reason or another, partially or completely retired from hog production during the year. These individuals, nevertheless, had an acceptable hog-production record for the base period. In the present year's contract, however, such scattered cases will be eliminated. Contracting producers will not be considered bona fide corn-hog farmers and therefore are not eligible for benefit payments unless they produce in 1935 an established minimum percentage of their average base production.

Mr. Speaker, a final misunderstanding I want to deal with here is that concerning imports of agricultural products into this country. During the past winter there has been some pick-up in our farm imports, particularly of feed grains. This has led to all sorts of wild stories about the country being deluged with foreign products as a result of the agricultural-adjustment program. Again I find that most of these statements are not based on fact.

The great reduction of agricultural output in this country last year as a result of the drought naturally created something of a vacuum into which imports might flow, but the total imports of feed grains to date are still very small in relation to production and consumption of these grains and in relation to the losses caused by the drought. Imports of all grains during the 8-month period ending with February this year were about six-tenths of 1 percent of this country's average production of grains and less than 2 percent of the loss to grain crops directly attributable to the drought. According to the Bureau of Agricultural Economics the total imports of all competitive agricultural products, including grains, during this 8-month period, were 25 percent less than the average imports for the same period during the 10 years—1924 to 1934.

Imports of oats, barley, and rye—crops which were not affected by the adjustment program—were relatively greater than imports of wheat and corn. Imports of meats during recent months have shown no increase over the average imports of recent years. We must keep our proportions straight on this matter of imports. A shipload of 250,000 bushels of corn sounds big, but actually it is less than one one-hundred thousandth of the normal corn crop of the United States. One good middle western county raises more corn in a normal year than has been imported into this country during the past winter.

Mr. Speaker, even though the United States is temporarily on an import basis in the case of grains because of the drought, it is still on an export basis for its major agricultural products. During 1934 approximately $650,000,000 worth of cotton, tobacco, meat products, grains and preparations, and fruits were exported as compared with importations of $125,000,000 worth of these products, including imports of $24,000,000 worth of bananas.

When we really look at the facts we find that the corn-hog industry and the other livestock and feed-grain industries have been materially benefited by the governmental activities. But to see this it certainly is necessary to look beyond all of the misstatements and tales of alarm. We are short on livestock and feed supplies now on account of the drought, but with the return of anything like normal weather we can soon get back to a more satisfactory level of production. Under the corn-hog program the farmers this year will plant an acreage sufficient, with anything like normal weather, to produce an adequate supply of corn for all purposes, including enough for reserve storage. In addition, they have unlimited use of their land not used for corn production.

The really big job for livestock producers now is to prevent the usual post-drought upswing from going beyond desirable limits. In the case of hogs, a sharp increase in production is likely to get under way by next spring unless control is continued in some form. Likewise, if feed production this year is approximately normal, and unless there is some organized attempt to head it off, a new upswing in cattle production also may be expected to get under way by 1936 or 1937.

If feed grain and livestock production should react to current high prices and the drought aftermath by increasing sharply, we would be off on another of the painful production cycles; first, the upswing until prices hit bottom, then the distressed liquidation until prices recover again. These cycles have been major hazards to the livestock industry for many years. Over an extended period the cycle does keep a working relationship between supply and demand, but it is a cruel and wasteful method.

In the light of results from programs thus far, it would seem wisdom on the part of livestock and feed-grain producers to continue production control in some form under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. And it would seem wisdom on the part of the Congress to elaborate and strengthen the act wherever necessary in order that it may better serve this purpose.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I propound a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The Speaker of the House of Representatives is the Chairman of the House Office Building Commission in charge of the House Office Building and which controls these office buildings.

I would like to ask the Speaker if there are any means that a Member has, under the regulations prescribed by the Commission governing these buildings, to prevent a Washington newspaper from installing a snooper at his office to interrogate and harass every person that goes in or comes out of a Member's office in that Government building?

The SPEAKER. The Commission is composed of 3 Members and the Speaker is only 1 of the 3. I would be pleased if the gentleman would take the matter up with the Commission as a whole. We will be very pleased to give the gentleman a hearing and discuss the matter with him.

Mr. BLANTON. The Washington Herald has had a snooper at my office in the House Office Building and people who come there to see me on important official business, which as a Member of Congress I am elected to look after, are stopped, insulted, and interrogated as soon as they come into the hall out of my office as to what occurred between us, and what they went there to see me about. And this lying newspaper every morning has a false statement about some purported interview that never occurred, when every word of it is an infamous lie. I am getting tired of it.

I intend to protect my friends and constituents who come to my office on important business, against this unwarranted and meddlesome interference and harrassment, and I intend to protect myself against the continued libels Hearst's Herald and Times, and the Washington Post continue to maliciously publish about me.

I can protect myself in the courts against these continued libels, and I intend to do it by filing suits just as soon as this Congress adjourns, and we can get public business out of the way, and I can finish all of my official duties here.

But I will not file these suits in Washington. I will file them in another jurisdiction, where the Herald, Times, and Post are circulated, and where under proper venue I can force them to respond and answer, because these papers have deliberately and wrongfully poisoned the minds of Washington people against me, until it would be an easy matter for them to get some juror here to hang the jury for them. But where I shall file them, there will be a fair trial and a verdict of an unbiased jury.

Hearst's papers told one lie in his publications on our good colleague from New York, and in the courts he made Hearst pay $5,000 for telling that lie. If a jury were to make Hearst and Eugene Meyer pay me $5,000 for every lie the Herald, Times, and Post have told on me, neither of them would have any money left, for these papers have told lies on me ever since I have been here. I want you colleagues to remember that everything you see in the Herald or Times or Post about me is a lie. They just will not tell the truth. Every purported interview you see in any of these three papers I want you to mark as a lie before you read it. I do not let them come to my office and do not let them interview me, and if they publish an interview, saying I am going to do this or that, you can put it down as an infamous, dirty lie. [Applause.]

TAKE THE PROFITS OUT OF WAR

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include therein an address which I made to the National Parent-Teachers Congress at Miami, Fla., on war profits.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert an address by myself at Miami, Fla., April 29, 1935:

Parents and teachers, you should be deeply interested in protecting the investment you have and are making in the youth of the Nation.

CHILDREN REPRESENT GREATEST INVESTMENT

A baby boy is born in a home. The parents guard his life with their own. They nurse him through all the childhood ailments at great sacrifice to themselves. They shield him from danger. They keep the long vigils over his sickbed. They guide his footsteps as he learns to walk. They give of themselves freely. They make in him their greatest investment.

Then he starts to school. The teacher also begins to make an investment in him. Patiently, painstakingly she trains him for citizenship. She trains him to take his place in society. He is promoted from time to time. Many teachers contribute to his education. He is preparing to be a professional man. He spends many hours in library and laboratory.

His parents all the time continue to sacrifice that he might have every opportunity. Finally he graduates from college. Teachers and parents have in him their greatest investment. He represents their contribution to the world.

From another home has come a beautiful girl representing likewise the years of love, patience, and sacrifice of parents and teachers. The two young people love each other and plan to marry.

Then suddenly the peaceful life of the Nation is shattered by the thunder of cannons; and on the battlefield the young man is sacrificed to Moloch, the god of war.

Thus, the greatest contribution it is possible for parents and teachers to make is destroyed in the twinkling of an eye. The hopes, the dreams, the prayers of a lifetime are blasted in a day.

Therefore, parents and teachers, you have a decided incentive to protect the investments that you are now making in our children against loss by war.

PRISONER FEEDS GUARD

It was 2 o'clock in the morning. The rain was running off my steel helmet in sheets. I had my rifle under my armpit to keep it dry. I was on guard around a German stockade. We had 437 German prisoners.

The armistice had been signed about a week, but we were required to guard our prisoners just the same.

I was cold, I was tired, I was homesick and hungry. I saw a light over in the German stockade, inside of the barracks which they used for a kitchen, and I knew that Frank, the German Pollack cook was doing his cooking for the next day. I threw a gravel over against the barracks and soon a flood of light shot out from the door as Frank poked out his square German head. I said to him in the best German that I could command, which wasn't very good, "Frank, given mer das brote und das kaffee."

Frank said, "Yah."

Pretty soon he returned with a canteen cup full of steaming hot coffee and a piece of German coffee cake. The coffee had cream and sugar in it, two delicacies we did not often have, but he had taken some from the amount allotted to him for cooking, and put it in my coffee.

The lightning flashed as he handed the coffee and coffee cake through the fence, and I saw his face, and there was no cynical grin of hatred there, but, rather, a smile of friendliness, and if he saw my face I know he saw friendliness there.

Frank did not hate me. He loved me. I did not hate him. I loved him, and yet if I had met him on the battlefield at that hour of the night 1 week before, I would have killed him or he would have killed me.

That is what war means. It means bringing men together, who otherwise would love each other, to kill each other.

War never proves which is wrong. It only proves which is strong.

If it is a question of medicine, ask a doctor. If it is a question of law, ask a lawyer. Then, if it is a question of war, ask the warrior. The ex-service men oppose war because they know the futility of it, but that does not mean that we would not serve our country again if our services were needed. We would.

It simply means that we are speaking now, while our country is at peace, protesting against conditions that lead to war and attempting to remove every war incentive.

PEACE PLANS THAT DO NOT GO FAR ENOUGH

Allow me to name some of the means of securing peace that have been relied upon in the past, and then suggest that these do not go far enough.

First, there are treaties, pacts, and agreements between nations. These are good as friendly gestures and are to be encouraged, but war will never be abolished by proclamation.

Then, again, there is the plan of educating for peace. This is a good idea and is to be continued by all means, but it is too slow. It takes generations before advancement can be made by the slow process of education. In the meantime we might have another world war that would annihilate civilization.

Further, there is the plan of disarmament. This, too, should be encouraged; but if one nation should get too far out in front on a disarmament program, that nation's weakness might invite attack. There is no use to deceive ourselves—the world has not yet come to the philosophy of peace on earth for the sake of brotherly love.

WEAKNESS INVITES ATTACK

When the Boston police struck, were the thugs of that city so honorable that they refused to plunder just because the people were unprotected? No; they plundered all the more. Algiers was unable to protect her boundaries, and Mussolini marched in. Manchuria's helplessness was too great a temptation for Japan to resist, so Japan marched in. Therefore, we cannot depend upon disarmament.

I do believe, however, that we can greatly promote peace if we are willing to pay the price; and the price of peace is to give up some of the profits that result from war and the preparation of war.

FOUR-POINT PLAN

I therefore wish to propose some definite steps which if taken would greatly further the cause of world peace.

First. The United States should control the preparation for war by requiring munition makers to operate under a Federal license system.

Second. The United States should make permanent its present nonintervention policy that refuses to send a military arm of the Government into a foreign country to protect private investments.

Third. The United States should equalize, as far as possible, the burdens of war by a universal draft law that will conscript money and materials as well as men.

Fourth. The United States should enact tax laws that will recover for the Government 100 percent of all war profits.

FIRST STEP, CONTROL MUNITION MAKERS BY LICENSE SYSTEM

I wish to take these up in order. First, is Government control of the preparations for war, and in order to effect this, it is necessary to place the manufacturers of munitions under a licensing system that will give the Government complete control of their policies and activities.

EMBARGO ON ARMS

By this means the Government could make effective an embargo on arms. The United States is not in a consistent position when we tell the rest of the world that we are a peace-loving nation at the same time that we are furnishing cannons, hand grenades, and machine guns for warring nations.

If I walk down the street and see two little boys quarreling, and give one of them a club and the other a pair of knucks, and stand back and watch them destroy each other, I can say to the crowd that gathers around that I am a peace-loving man until I am black in the face, but if they know that I furnished the instruments of destruction they know that I am a liar and a hypocrite.

But you say that the United States as a nation does not furnish munitions. We only allow the private manufacturers to furnish them. That is true, but the people of other nations do not distinguish between the Du Pont Manufacturing Co. of America and the American Government. They do not distinguish between the United Steel Corporation and the United States. To them, if it is made in America, it means America.

The United States narrowly evaded a break with Mexico in 1924 because some of the revolutionists captured in Nicaragua were using guns made in the United States.

When relations were so strained between the National Chinese Government and Russia that it seemed war was inevitable, the United States diplomats were anxious to avert war if possible, so they offered to serve as peacemakers between Russia and China. But to their surprise Russia refused their services. In the same paper in which I read of Russia's refusal to have Americans serve as peacemakers I read where three more war planes were shipped from the United States to China. These were part of an order of 15 planes of the combat type, the total order amounting to $500,000 in gold to be paid in New York City.

For years the manufacturers of munitions in the United States have furnished engines of death to warring nations all over the globe, and yet we have proclaimed to the world that we are a peace-loving nation. Our words whisper peace and our actions thunder war.

What was the final straw that broke the camel's back and plunged America into the last war? It was the sinking of the Lusitania, was it not? Mrs. William Jennings Bryan, wife of the Secretary of State, wrote in her diary that they were dining out on the evening that the news came of the sinking of the Lusitania.

"Mr. Bryan was very much disturbed at the news. He said on the way home, speaking of the Lusitania: 'I wonder if she had munitions on board?' 'If she did,' he said, 'that puts a different phase on the whole matter. I will have Lansing investigate that.'

"The next day Mr. Lansing examined the clearance papers and reported that the Lusitania did have munitions on board."

The manufacturers were so eager for the profits on one more cargo of death that they endangered the lives of citizens who took passage on that passenger ship and plunged America into the World War.

This unbridled campaign for profits at the cost of American lives and world peace can be controlled by the Government through a licensing system.

COMPETITIVE ARMAMENT CAMPAIGNS

Then, again, the Government can prevent competitive armament campaigns which are carried on by the makers of munitions. These manufacturers employ the highest powered salesmen in the world. They sell one nation a battleship. Then they go to the nation's neighbor and through propaganda they play up in the papers and periodicals the fact that this nation has bought a battleship, and as a result of that propaganda they sell that nation's neighbor two battleships. They return to the first nation and attempt to sell that nation three battleships. The result is a vicious competitive spiral that makes war between nations and profits for the manufacturers of death.

This pernicious practice of promoting war can be controlled through a licensing system that should be in effect now, today, as a means of preventing war.

CONTROL WAR PROPAGANDA

The manufacturers of munitions have the incentive of profits that leads to campaigns of propaganda in order to bring about war. Do you remember before America entered the last war the floods of propaganda that were poured out in this country, telling us of the atrocities of the Germans?

I remember reading how the Germans were cutting off the hands of little Belgian and French children, and in my imagination I could see children holding up thousands of pitiful little stubs, begging for redress. Then I went to France. I crossed France from north to south, but I did not see one child in Belgium or France that had its hands cut off, nor did I talk to a single soldier who had seen one child maimed in this manner.

Of course, I did not talk to all of the soldiers, but it seems that if the propaganda had been even partially true that somebody would have seen some of these children. No doubt there were atrocities on both sides, for war itself is an atrocity. But such propaganda is hatched up in the minds of the makers of death, and is intended to inflame the passions of people and result in war, for profits cannot flow in the munitions business unless blood flows on the battlefield.

MUNITION MAKERS ARM OUR ENEMIES

Furthermore, by the Government controlling the manufacture of munitions, we could prevent American manufacturers from arming our potential enemies. The munition maker is not a patriot of any nation. He is an internationalist. Patriotism to him is only a sentiment on which he can play to engender war and increase his profits.

It has been brought out before the Senate investigation committee that the munition makers peddle their wares in every nation on the globe.

Today at this hour in the laboratories scientists are pouring over death-dealing devices and new war inventions. What for? For the exclusive benefit of America? To protect America from a foreign enemy? To destroy the foes of America? No; they will no sooner be perfected than they are peddled to every nation on the face of the earth by the highest-powered salesmanship known, and yet the Du Ponts said before the investigation committee that if it had not been for the Du Ponts America would today be a German colony.

They sell America steel plates for her battleships. What for? To protect them from torpedoes they have already sold to our potential enemies. They sell America gas masks for our soldiers. What for? To protect our soldiers against gas bombs they have already sold to our potential enemies. They sell America antiaircraft guns. What for? To bring down war planes they have already sold to our potential enemies.

In the World War a contingent of English troops was trying to take a certain objective. There was one gun that was particularly deadly. It mowed down the Tommies. Many fell trying to capture it. Finally, after a great loss, the gallant Tommies captured it. They thought it a fitting tribute to take it back to England and mount it in a public park as a memorial to those who fell while capturing it. There in Bedford, England, it stands today in one of the parks. On one side of its deadly barrel are engraved the names of the men who fell while capturing it, and on the other side engraved in the steel is the name of the makers—a British company.

It takes a lot of patriotism out of a soldier to be shot by a gun that is manufactured in his own country.

When the Allies tried to capture the Dardanelles they were fired upon by guns manufactured in England and financed by a French bank.

The Senate investigating committee has exposed the deeds of the international munitions ring. It has flung open the closet door of this Bluebeard of war.

They are not patriots; they are internationalists.

All they know of patriotism is that it is a fine sentiment on which they can play to generate the war spirit and increase their profits.

Therefore our Government should, at the earliest possible hour, set up a licensing system under which they require the manufacturers of munitions to operate in order that our Government might control their policies and activities.

SECOND STEP, NONINTERVENTION POLICY

The second step that will go a long way toward preventing war is a foreign policy that will refuse to send a military arm of the Government to protect private investments in foreign countries. When a person invests in a foreign country that is a commercial venture. It is a business gamble. If he makes a profit, he takes it all, and if he has a loss, he should stand that, because when he invested, he knew that it was a chance, and he took that chance because of the profit incentive.

In other words, it is a cold-blooded business venture and the only motive is profit.

When a man invests in a business proposition within the Nation, he does not expect the Government to guarantee him against loss. Why, then, should foreign investments be given this protection?

Of course, if an American citizen in a foreign nation is discriminated against merely because he is a citizen of the United States, then it becomes an affair of the National Government; but as long as a citizen of this Nation is accorded the same treatment that citizens of other nations are in a foreign country, there is no just cause for complaint, and certainly not for intervention.

INTERVENTION IN NICARAGUA

How many of you know why the marines were sent to Nicaragua? We were given several different answers. First, we were told that they were sent down there to protect Americans, but then we found out that not one American life was ever endangered. Then we were told they were sent down there to protect American property, and at first we thought they meant Government property, but then we found out that the United States did not have any property in Nicaragua except a canal-zone right which never was questioned.

And finally we were told they were sent down there to hold a just election. Somebody said we could use them for that purpose in some of the elections held in this country, so we laughed that off.

There was cause for occupying Nicaragua but not for intervention. The customs services at Nicaragua were not satisfactory to other nations; so rather than have other nations occupy the port, we sent the marines there to guarantee satisfactory customs service. Had our forces only occupied Nicaragua it would have been justified, but we intervened.

Why? I will tell you the facts and let you answer for yourself.

Capitalists in the United States had loans and investments in Nicaragua to the amount of over $18,000,000. If the Nicaraguan Government were overturned by revolution, those loans and investments would be no good; but if that Government were held in power at the point of American bayonets, the loans and titles to oil properties and gold mines would be protected.

Thus all of the people of the United States were asked to support a military movement to protect the investments of a very small group who had invested in Nicaragua for the purpose of making a profit. It cost the Government of the United States over $6,000,000 to protect the $18,000,000 of private investment. It cost the lives of 150 American soldiers and approximately 450 Nicaraguans. The life of one good American boy should be held to be of more value than the total investments in Nicaragua.

If we want peace, we should follow a foreign policy that holds blood to be more precious than gold, and peace more precious than profit.

Why, the coconut growers of South America would make more money if the monkeys did not carry off their coconuts. Why not send the marines down there to herd the monkeys away from their coconut groves? It would be the same principle, and much more humane.

We lost not only the lives of 150 Americans and 450 Nicaraguans but the good will of many of the Latin Americans, for at the same time that President Coolidge was in Habana speaking before the World Peace Conference, telling the world that we are a great peace-loving Nation, at that same time the newsboys on the streets were shouting, "Forty Nicaraguans killed in American air raid!"

Again our actions thunder war and our words whisper peace.

But we may take heart, because the United States has launched a nonintervention policy, and the last marine has been called out of Nicaragua.

NO INTERVENTION IN CUBA

Then, again, there was the Cuban situation. Only a few months ago there was a revolution in Cuba. Now, for years United States investors in the sugar business have taken millions of dollars' profit from Cuba. According to the papers and magazines, about 90 percent of Cuba is owned by United States capitalists. We have been called Cuba's big brother, but it looks more as if we are the "sugar daddy."

Now, it is entirely legitimate, perhaps commendable, for people to invest in foreign enterprises. It is entirely all right for citizens of the United States to invest their money in the sugar business in Cuba, and if they make a profit, so far as I am concerned, they are welcome to it; but if they have a loss, they can have that, too. I do not wish to be cut in on the loss and left out on the profit.

In the last disturbance in Cuba, you remember there was great agitation in this country for the Government to "Send a battleship to Cuba", "Send the marines to Cuba", "Put down the revolution in Cuba", but our Government has launched a new foreign policy. Our President has shattered precedent, has taken a new step in world diplomacy and statecraft. He came courageously out with a proclamation stating that there would be no intervention in Cuba. There was no intervention in Cuba, and she settled her own domestic trouble.

I, therefore, urge that we make permanent as a means of promoting peace this nonintervention policy launched by President Roosevelt.

THIRD STEP, UNIVERSAL DRAFT

The third step that will go a long way toward promoting peace is a universal draft of money and materials as well as men. This has the unqualified support of the American Legion. Such a universal mobilization of the financial and material resources of the Nation as well as the man power would make us more effective in war. In my opinion, if our Nation is plunged into war, every man back of us and every dime of resources should be at the disposal of the Government for the successful prosecution of that war. But there are those who say, "That is a fine theory but it cannot be put into practice."

Indeed, it can be put into practice. A few manufacturers and financeers with a fine brand of salesmanship have been able to sell that idea, that it cannot be put into practice, to enough of our lawmakers to block such legislation.

CONSCRIPTION OF FINANCIAL RESOURCES

In the first place, conscription of the financial resources of the Nation can be accomplished by the establishment of a Government bank to finance the war. The duty of this bank would be to purchase Government bonds with Government credit, thus saving billions to the Government in interest.

In the last war the Government commanded men to face death, but begged for enough money to pay for the food they ate before they died.

Can you comprehend the inequality, the injustice of a nation commanding men to face death, and then on bended knees begging for money? Isn't it so? Did we not do it? Didn't they get the prettiest girls they could find and have them go out in front of the curtains in theaters and make 4-minute speeches begging people to buy Liberty bonds and Victory bonds, and offering them the great inducement of 4-percent interest?

Yet one of the cardinal principles of our Government is that we are to hold human rights above property rights. Yet in the last war, and in all previous wars, we reversed that. A man's property was more sacred than another man's life.

During the Civil War Abraham Lincoln went to New York to see the bankers to get more money in order that he might carry on the war to save the Union. He saw that the bankers were holding out for better terms. Finally he stood up, his eyes flashing fire. He said, "I can conscript a widow's only son. I can take him from between the plow handles and put him in the battle's front where his life won't be good for 6 minutes, but I cannot lay hands on enough money to pay for the food he eats."

It was true in the Civil War. It was true in the World War, and unless we act now during peace, it will be true in the next war.

By means of a bank of the United States a money levy could be made upon the wealth of the Nation and thus the financial resources drafted to serve as well as the man power.

BLANKET DRAFT OF ALL CIVILIANS

As a second means of compelling a universal service in case of war, there should be a conscription law providing for a blanket conscription of all civilians as well as conscription for military service. This would mean that every civilian would go right on with his regular activities until called upon for special service by his Government. It would mean that he would simply hold himself in readiness and then when his Government called, that it would be necessary for him to act or suffer military court martial just as it is in the case of men who are conscripted as combat troops.

In the last war men were notified to hold themselves in readiness for service. Why could not that be done in respect to the leaders and managers of industry? It would not be necessary to require them to wear military uniforms, but the Government could fix their pay the same as that for military service.

In order to make this blanket draft effective, there should be a war board established now in peace time, representing the military, the civilian, and the industrial needs of the Nation in case of war. This board should have a complete plan for industrial mobilization, for price fixing, for determining priorities as to labor as well as materials.

It is true the War Department has certain plans already made and documented, but those plans represent the military alone. The board should be set up now with a representative from industry and one representing the civilian needs as well as the military.

Through this board the Government could simply require the manager of a factory to cooperate with the Government in furnishing needed supplies. The pay of the manager and the workers would be the same as that of officers and enlisted men.

The Senate investigating committee brought out the fact that in the last war, at one of the most crucial times of the war, the Du Pont Manufacturing Co. bickered with the Government for 3 months over the profits that they were to receive for manufacturing powder. The Government requested them to build the Old Hickory Powder Plant and manufacture powder, and for 3 months they refused the demands of their Government because the profits were not sufficient to satisfy them. What would happen if the soldier in line of battle refused to obey commands because his pay was not enough? He would be court-martialed and shot, and yet the Du Ponts who were so patriotic that they kept us from being a German colony, refused to manufacture powder because their profits were not enough.

With a blanket draft covering every person in the United States a situation like this could not arise.

FOURTH STEP, PROFITS TAXES

Now the fourth and final step that would promote peace by removing the profits from war is the passage of tax laws that would take 100 percent of all war profits. War should be a burden to everyone. Then everyone will oppose war.

WAR PROFITS

In the feverish days of the war, Americans bent every energy to win that war. Our statesmen could not and did not count dollars and cents when lives were at stake. They proceeded on the assumption that the men with whom they dealt were honest. What I say here is not meant as a criticism of the Government but it is merely a statement of facts that should not be true of the next war. Could you imagine that while our mothers and fathers skimped and saved and gave and gave—that while the soldiers were not questioning but were going forward to their duty—could you believe at this time that there were people in America so low and so debased as to be turning this war to profit? Not only that, but actually filching millions from the Government. Suave, fat-handed, slick-haired men, who would sit at their sumptuous meals and remark about the dreadful war and what sacrifices the American people were making to win it.

In round numbers the war cost the United States $29,000,000,000. Nobody knows how much a billion dollars is, it is so much, but that is what economists say the war cost our Government. Do you know how much of that went to the pay of soldiers, the men who faced death? Five percent. Most of the rest went to war profiteers.

Do you know what it cost the average soldier in dollars and cents to go to war? Figure it out for yourself. If a boy had stayed out of service he could have earned $7 a day for unskilled labor. That was the lowest. Anybody could get $7 a day. But the soldier received 75 cents a day. You thought we got a dollar. We did, but we had to pay $6 to $8 a month back into the Government on our life insurance. The privates paid back into the Government something like $408,000,000 out of their slim pay of $30 a month, to pay the death claims of their dead buddies. But the difference between what a boy received who was in the service and one who was not, at the lowest estimate over a period of 16 months is $2,800. That is what it cost a boy to be patriotic. But you say, you cannot pay for patriotism. No, you cannot; but there is no reason to penalize it. It is bad enough for the soldier to suffer the physical dangers of war without requiring him to bear the economic loss as well. While we were serving for 75 cents a day and a chance to die, there were 22,000 millionaires made in the United States. Du Pont Manufacturing Co. made 100 percent profit during each of the 4 years of the war. The steel companies made from 27 to 65 percent during each year of the war.

TRUCKS AND AUTOMOBILES

At Puniers, France, I saw 2 miles of Liberty trucks, Cadillac, Dodge, and Ford touring cars backed one up against the other. They were junked. Most of these were in good condition; some were almost new. I wanted to buy one and ship it home, because I knew I'd need a car when I got back home. The captain said, "You can have one; that is, if you will just take it. But you cannot ship it home." The corporals and the sergeants sold some of them to some of the French for $5 each. Others were just taken, others smashed up. The Government had purchased these automobiles from factories, and paid those factories handsome profits, for the factories were not out one cent for advertising or salesmanship. Not only that, but the manufacturers were so greedy for profits that they were able to keep these from coming back to America to lower the market price here. They were junked and salvaged and the taxpayers paid for them, and the profiteer smiled and rubbed his hands and remarked about the noble sacrifice of the American people.

AIRPLANE PROFITS

What about our war record in airplanes? America set out to "win the war in the air." We were going to relieve our allies of any air fighting. We were going to take care of that little matter for them. The program called for 25,000 airplanes; 20,000 were to be on the front by January 1918, and General Pershing attested to the record that not one single American-made fighting plane ever reached the front.

What was the result? Our American buddies had to fly planes secured from the Allies. Of course, these were the older, out-of-date, less efficient ones. The result was that in these "flaming coffins" the losses among the American airmen were three times as great in proportion as they were among the Allies, not because our boys were not good pilots, but because when they took off in one of these ships, death rode in the cockpit with them.

But what about the bill for these planes that never did arrive? Did the bill come? Oh, yes it was on time—$1,051,511,988 strong. One company, for 3,660 airplane motors, received a profit not including cost, but naked profit, of $3,934,500. Another company, for 6,500 motors, received a cold profit of $15,000,000.

A Government audit of the Standard Aircraft Corporation and the Standard Aero Co. showed that these two concerns were overpaid $6,500,000. The affairs of the company were immediately put into liquidation. The Government had a fat chance of ever getting that back. And, to add insult to injury, these two companies were owned by the great Japanese house of Mitsui & Co. And Mitsui & Co. were paymasters of the Mikado of Japan, and at one time were paymasters of the great international spy system of the German Government. Oh, for the eloquence of a top sergeant to express my feelings.

PROFITEERING IN RAINCOATS

Then, again, think of those manufacturers who made raincoats of "mosquito netting" and sold them to the Government for the best India rubber. I am confident that the death of some of the boys in my own company was caused by the rain soaking through those raincoats and chilling their backs and shoulders while they drilled to protect those profiteers who betrayed them.

I was in the Sandstorm Division, the Thirty-fourth. We trained at Camp Cody, N. Mex., then stopped at Camp Dix, N. J., for final training before we went over. The rainy season hit us there. It rained every day and we drilled every day. I came in many nights soaked through to the skin across the shoulders because of those flimsy raincoats. We drilled rain or shine. The soldier can't select his weather.

Then the "flu" hit us. The boys died like flies. We stacked them up in the morgue like cordwood. I was on the firing squad. Every morning we marched down to the station to fire a salute over a flag-wrapped body. Then we loaded it on to a train and shipped it back to some station where a little woman in black was waiting to receive it.

Then one day I sat by the bunk of one of my buddies, a lad from Colorado, and heard that death rattle in his throat, caused by the "flu" which he had caught while drilling in the rain with one of these flimsy raincoats. The next day they took him to the hospital and a few days later to the morgue. As I stood with the firing squad and we fired the salute over his flag-wrapped body, I thought of some fat-handed, slick-haired, well-groomed millionaire, sitting behind his mahogany desk, figuring his profits, calculating his bloodstained gold; and I vowed then, if the chance ever came, I would make my war on the profiteer. This is my chance.

SPEAKING FOR THOSE WHO CANNOT SPEAK

My friends, I am speaking for those who cannot talk. Tonight when the sun went down 15 more of my buddies went "west" out of our hospitals. That is the average. They have been dying a slow and tortuous death for 17 years. I'm speaking for the men in our TB hospitals. The living dead. Gassed lungs, the white plague, then wait for the end. I'm speaking for the orphan children whose daddies fell when it might have been me. Some of them never saw their daddies. I'm speaking for the shell-shocked boys whose bodies came back but their minds did not. I'm speaking for the soft-cheeked babies and the millions of school children, who will be sacrificed in the next war. I'm speaking for the gold-star mothers, who paid the greatest price of all. Year before last the Government gave 3,000 of them a trip to France to see the last resting places of their sons.

Do you see the mother as she stands by the grave where they tell her her son sleeps? Stands? What mother would stand? She gets down on the earth as close to him as she can. I'm speaking for her. For is not 6 feet of earth and a white cross rather poor compensation to a mother for her years of training and hopes and prayers?

Then I'm speaking for those lips that are silent in death.

"A million wooden crosses are calling out to you,
We died that war may be no more,
What are you going to do?
A thousand sightless heroes have caught a vision new,
The vision of a world at peace,
'What are you going to do?'

A thousand little laddies who never saw their dad
Will be the next cannon food
When next the world goes mad.
Our wooden crosses they are dumb, but the message you can bring,
Tell the world, the careless world,
War is a cursed thing."

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, during the past few weeks there has grown up in the minds of some of us Democrats some question as to the exact present popularity of our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. As we have listened to criticisms of various and sundry types emanating many times from this side of the House, we have begun to wonder just how popular our President is with the great masses of the people of this country today.

Today our doubts have been dispelled, because we read in one of the great Washington newspapers this morning the following headline:

The United States Chamber assaults new deal.

This news to the farmers back in the West, the Northwest, and the Southwest, to the 11,000,000 unemployed men in this great country of ours, and to the 20,000,000 who are on the relief rolls is the best news that could possibly be received by them.

This very news itself, that the United States Chamber of Commerce, a predatory organization of assassins of prosperity for the farmers, of parasites and plunderbunds upon the wage earnings of the laborers and parasites who swoop down like buzzards with their talons and claws sharpened for the small business men of this country, is enough to cause a rekindling of all of the wavering faith and loyalty that our people may have had in this great leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, the man who talked so freely about the forgotten masses in the 1932 historic campaign.

The fact that these gentlemen have definitely arrayed themselves against the new deal and are now demanding the repeal of the N. R. A. and other Government bureaus is the best evidence, to my mind, that certain features of the N. R. A. must be maintained and perpetuated. I am pleased to say that the American Federation of Labor wants a continuance of the good clauses of N. R. A., such as the abolition of child labor, the outlawing of "yellow dog" contracts, and the right of collective bargaining under section 7 (a).

The fact is that the United States Chamber of Commerce, formerly headed by Julius Barnes, has opposed every farm-relief bill beginning back with the McNary-Haugen bill and then drifting to the domestic-allotment bill, and now they are opposing the A. A. A. and the processing tax. This is the best proof that can be presented to me that this Government and this administration is on the right track and that some of these new-deal ventures, so-called, ought to be continued and given a further try-out for at least another year or so.

I want every farmer in this country, I want every wage-worker, I want every independent business man and small producer to know that this unholy group of business, the United States Chamber of Commerce vultures, is against the new-deal and Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

The newspaper article is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 3, 1935]

CHAMBER ASSAULTS NEW DEAL AS ROPER AND ALLIES DISSENT; N. R. A. UP IN COURT AND SENATE—23 ON ADVISORY GROUP UPHOLD SOCIAL BILL, N. R. A. EXTENSION—REFORM MEASURES HIT BY CHAMBER—"NO REASON TO FOLLOW WILL OF PRESIDENT," DECLARES SIBLEY

Three hours after the Chamber of Commerce of the United States had adopted resolutions harshly criticizing most of the new deal recovery measures, a group of business men called at the White House yesterday afternoon and told President Roosevelt they favored N. R. A. extension and the administration's social-security legislation. Both measures had been condemned in the chamber resolution.

The group consisted of 23 members of the business advisory council of the Department of Commerce. Most of them were members of the chamber of commerce. Included was Henry I. Harriman, retiring president of the chamber, who presided at the convention meeting at which new-deal measures were condemned.

"NO POLITICS," SAYS KENDALL

Following his conference with President Roosevelt, H. P. Kendall, chairman of the advisory council, declared that "there is no politics back of this report."

"We are here to uphold the President's hand in the fight against the depression," he said. "Certain of our members are members of the chamber of commerce, but we are not spokesmen for the chamber or any other organization."

Secretary Roper, who accompanied the delegation, said the committee had endorsed in a general way the social-security program. He also said that most of the members of the committee were members of the chamber of commerce and added that "they were delighted to tell the President they were for his program."

A social-security report presented to the President by the council members will be sent to Secretary Perkins and is expected to be made public today. The report on N. R. A. asked for a 2-year extension and recommended provisions in the administration bill.

The stand of the chamber of commerce against administration measures was characterized by Harper Sibley, its newly elected president, as "an honest difference of opinion." Declaring that the business emergency has passed, he said it is "time to review the emergency measures."

"There is no reason why we should follow the will of the President", he added.

Far from "following the will of the President", the resolutions either condemned entirely or severely criticized the present National Industrial Recovery Act, social-security legislation, securities control legislation, proposed amendments to the Banking Act, the Wagner labor-disputes bill, the utilities-holding company bill, amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and Government interference in business.

Reserved for future action were resolutions on the cotton-textile problem, on emergency relief activities, and on Government loans, in addition to other resolutions not so closely related to the administration program.

The chamber of commerce pronouncements, coming just as preliminaries of the next Presidential campaign are getting under way, are expected to constitute something of a guide for political opponents of the administration.

At the same time, a high administration spokesman said yesterday that "business men never really were for the administration at any time." He added that he expected them to be against the administration next year and that Democratic votes would "come from the plain people." He predicted an overwhelming Roosevelt victory.

NOT REACTIONARY, SAYS SIBLEY

Sibley described the resolutions as "very forward looking" and declared he did not feel they were reactionary. He said the chamber of commerce had "simply expressed to the administration in a polite way its differences of opinion."

The new chamber president, who was a schoolmate of President Roosevelt at Groton and who was in Harvard at the same time as the President, said he expected to take the resolutions to the White House sometime next week and that he hoped there would be free discussion between representatives of the Government and of the chamber.

"When there are honest differences of opinion there must be free expression", he said. "The administration is for the whole people. So is the chamber of commerce. I hope that through open discussion we can arrive at a solution."

He said the resolutions did not represent so much opposition to new-deal laws as a feeling that too much had been attempted by the Government in too short a time.

"We question the Government's haste", he said, "and also its methods—to some extent."

WILL "CAMPAIGN"

Describing the business situation, he said:

"It looks to me as if the business patient is very healthy. He seems to have a lot of pep. They say that a convalescent is sometimes vociferous."

Sibley said the chamber of commerce expected to "campaign" for its views.

At the session yesterday morning some discussion was created by the fact that President Roosevelt had sent no message to the convention. Last year he sent a message asking cooperation and condemning business men "who cry 'wolf!'" Two years ago he attended the dinner which closed the convention.

INVITED TO DINNER

At the White House it was said that President Roosevelt had not been asked to send a message. It was said he had been invited to attend the dinner Wednesday night, but that he had declined because of the pressure of business and because he did not wish to add to statements he made in a radio speech last Sunday night.

These statements were confirmed by both Sibley and Henry I. Harriman, retiring president of the chamber, both of whom were White House callers last week.

PAY-ROLL TAX HIT

It declared the proposed pay-roll tax would impose a heavy burden upon industry and should not be considered until recovery is assured.

"Finally", it said, "we question the propriety as well as the constitutionality of any effort by the Federal Government designed to take jurisdiction over the subject matter of this proposed legislation."

The N. R. A. resolution asked that the present law be allowed to expire and that substitute legislation be enacted for definitely limited time. The new legislation, it said, should provide for voluntary codes, with no provision for imposing or amending codes by executive action. It declared also that the new legislation should permit agreements between competitors, which upon receiving governmental approval, would be free from the penalties of the antitrust laws.

CHARGES INVESTMENT HINDERED

"The collective-bargaining provisions of the present law have definitely disproved their worth", the resolution said. "Further, we are of the opinion that efforts to enforce obedience to codes by extrajudicial methods, such as the Blue Eagle, withholding or withdrawal of Government contracts, and appeals to public prejudice, are contrary to our national traditions."

In the resolution on durable goods, the convention declared that existing laws prevent investment of large sums necessary to restore these industries.

"Securities legislation'", the resolution said, "should be of such a character that sound finance may proceed confidently. The Government should retire from all activities that compete with private industry."

Opposing the banking amendments, the delegates adopted a resolution declaring:

"The measure provides for such concentration of power over reserve and commercial banking as would mean the establishment of a central-bank mechanism that, under political control and influence, would necessarily destroy the present plan."

OPPOSE 30-HOUR WEEK

The resolution endorsed the Federal Reserve System as it now exists.

The chamber declared itself "definitely opposed" both to 30-hour-week legislation and to the Wagner labor-disputes bill.

In taking a stand on the holding-company bill, the delegates opposed what they termed "Federal regulation of operating companies" and declared, "Holding companies have had a substantial part in the development of our electric and gas utilities and have undoubtedly conferred upon large areas benefits which they otherwise would have lacked."

In reference to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the convention asked that Government aid given the producer be limited to the crop which is domestically consumed.

"We oppose", the resolution said, "any further governmental authority over the freedom of action of producers, processors, or distributors of basic agricultural products as provided in proposed amendments."

LABOR RELATIONS

Prominently before Congress in the field of labor relations are two measures, the one designed to establish a uniform 30-hour work week throughout business and industry and the other undertaking to deal with labor relations in all industry and all fields of commerce and to create a permanent National Labor Relations Board.

To each of these proposals the chamber is definitely opposed. Statutory regulation and reduction of hours of work not only would prevent that flexible adjustment of hours so essential to the proper conduct of business operations under constantly varying conditions but it will inevitably result in marked increases in prices, in turn producing decreased consumption, decreased production, and consequent unemployment. Economic recovery must come from an increased, not from a reduced, production.

Proposals such as those embodied in the labor-relations bill would operate to disrupt rather than to promote proper relations between employer and employee, and likewise retard the normal processes toward recovery. Any attempt to bar any form of honestly organized labor group from the provisions of collective bargaining, or to bar minorities from the privilege of conferring with their employers upon terms of work, is un-American, indefensible, and unsupported by any considerations of the public interest. Employees, untrammeled or uncoerced by any person, should have the right to organize in such way as they desire for the purpose of collective bargaining; or, if they so prefer, they should have preserved to them the right to bargain individually.

UTILITY BILL OF 1935

To the regulation of public utilities, the chamber has long been committed. It has advocated that State commissions should be given ample power, with necessary financial support and adequate personnel, to enable them to discharge their public duties efficiently with respect to electric and gas utilities. Where operating areas extend across State lines and involve interstate transmission, the chamber has urged that State agencies should take concurrent action with such participation by the Federal Power Commission as interstate problems require. The chamber has recognized the necessity for reasonable and adequate regulation for all aspects of utility enterprises that affect the public interest, both as regards consumers and investors.

The utility bill of 1935, as introduced in Congress, not only would seek to superimpose Federal regulation upon State regulation of operating utilities but would undertake to destroy utility-holding companies, which have had a substantial part in the development of our electric and gas utilities and which have undoubtedly conferred upon large areas benefits which they otherwise would have lacked. The growth of American utility enterprises has in some cases been accompanied by abuses. It is in the public interest that all such abuses should be prevented. As many abuses to which public attention has been called have related to securities, the Federal Securities Act would seem to afford assurance for the future.

Other abuses should be definitely identified in legislation and such provisions for regulation should be made as the public interest requires. The destruction of enterprises not only will mean violation of fundamental principles but inevitable losses to millions of innocent investors. Even threat of destruction brings disadvantage to many communities through postponement of services they need for their development and causes national loss through withholding from those industries most affected by unemployment orders for construction and equipment that would afford a large aggregate of work.

All attempt to superimpose Federal regulation of operating companies upon State regulation should be abandoned. The effects can only be detrimental to the interests of the communities which are served and to the exercise of State authority over utilities which in every true sense are essentially local.

CHAMBER'S FIGHT ON NEW DEAL AMAZES ITS LONDON DIRECTOR

Francis E. Powell, head of the United States Chamber of Commerce in London, last night said the Old World is amazed at the stubborn fight being made by business here against the new deal.

Powell, tall and silver-haired, once was chairman of the Anglo-American Oil Co. He was astonished, he said, at the frosty reception that greeted his attempt yesterday to bring peace between American merchants and the White House.

Hundreds of delegates of the United States Chamber of Commerce Convention sat in grim silence as Powell proposed that a group be notified to call on Mr. Roosevelt and pledge cooperation. Henry I. Harriman, retiring president, ruled Powell out of order.

"I was shocked at their attitude", he told the United Press in an exclusive interview. "It couldn't have happened anywhere else in the world. I have listened for days to the criticism of the Government's policies.

"Some admitted perhaps the recovery work had done some good—shall we say they grudgingly admitted it?

"The delegates have heard what great strides we in England are making out of the depression. They have been told that it was due to our tariffs, to heavier taxes—to balancing the budget.

"Well, that much is true. What they haven't been told is the British business men cooperated with their Government. They paid higher taxes; yes. They subjected themselves to many things to expedite recovery."

Immaculate in black coat, striped trousers, white shirt, black tie, and winged collar, Powell shook his head as he watched delegates stream from the convention floor after definitely rejecting any plan by the Government to provide for the aged indigent.

"But", he asked, "how can they do these things? Perhaps we are not ready in this country yet for unemployment insurance. Perhaps it should be given more study. But we are, and always have been, ready for any legislation which removes the awful fear of want and poverty in the minds of those of us who are growing old."

Powell left his home in Cincinnati many years ago and described himself as a "citizen of the world." He left his interviewer with one forecast, emphatically stated:

"American business will have to cooperate with this administration in the new era about us or—get something worse."

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Measures restricting the production of exportable farm products which can be grown in other sections of the world inevitably react to the disadvantage of the country imposing such restrictions, by encouraging their growth in other countries.

We recommend that any governmental financial aid given to the producer be limited to that portion of the crop which is domestically consumed. This policy would insure him a price that would compensate for his labor and preserve a parity with those things he has to buy. We believe exported agricultural products should be sold at world prices, to preserve our foreign markets and stimulate our general trade.

We oppose any further extension of governmental authority over the freedom of action of producers, processors, or distributors of basic agricultural products, as provided in the proposed amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, H. R. 7713 and S. 1807, and in the commodity exchange bill, H. R. 6772 and S. 1334. We insist that in these bills the Government shall not, by law or by subsidy, control or attempt to increase the control over any producer, possessor or distributor by license, quota, or otherwise, in the lawful and independent operation of his own enterprise; and we further insist that the Government shall not, by law, or otherwise, give preferential treatment to any group; nor shall the Government empower or sanction the imposition by one group of an industry of its will on another group in that industry, as contemplated in the bills referred to above.

SELF-REGULATION OF INDUSTRY

Business has long maintained trade associations as a means of carrying on important functions in the interest of business and the public. The efficiency of management has been furthered, the extension of markets promoted, the stabilization of employment fostered, the establishment of fair competition advanced, and the rights of industry upheld through the proper operation of truly representative trade associations.

The benefits which have accrued from such cooperative work have been due, in part, to the flexibility, the voluntary character, and the freedom from special forms of governmental control of trade associations. Such conditions should be continued.

The establishment of agencies under governmental control to carry on activities recognized as proper functions of trade associations, or the assumption of such activities by governmental agencies, will limit the field and functions of trade associations, retard the self-organization and self-government of industry and the furtherance of mutual cooperative action for the benefit of industry and the public.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, when these farmers, wage workers, independent business men, and producers realize fully that big business is definitely and unalterably opposed to certain recovery measures sponsored by the Roosevelt Administration and enacted into law by the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses, they have only to understand how their particular group is affected or will be affected by the legislation which the United States Chamber of Commerce so roundly condemns.

The chamber of commerce, through their mouthpiece, Mr. Harper Sibley, declares there is "an honest difference of opinion", declaring that the business emergency has passed. He said it is "time to review the emergency measures."

How about it, Mr. Farmer? Has the great emergency and the need to restore farm commodity prices to a profitable level passed? The answer is "no." Price levels today are much better than they were before this administration came into power. All farmers need today is a good crop to sell at present price levels. He needs a continuance of legislation that will maintain not for 1 year but for the years to come selling levels already established during this administration. Has the emergency period for unemployed workmen and the millions of others on Government relief rolls passed? No, they still need the protecting hand and arm of a humane government that will continue to provide food, clothing, and shelter for those casualties of the Hoover depression and panic. Until men are actually reemployed, small business reestablished, it is absolutely necessary that they be assisted by the President and the Congress instead of consigning themselves to the tender mercies of the captains of finance and buccaneers of big business.

Mr. Sibley says, "There is no reason why we should follow the will of the President." Certainly not one of the common people ever believed for a moment that these brigands would follow the will of any President unless that President happened to be subservient to their own will and a piece of putty in their hands. Their interpretation of the will of the President is to express themselves as being opposed to social-security legislation. This will be comforting news to those 7,500,000 aged unfortunates who have passed the age of 65 and 1,000,000 of whom are dependent upon relatives or charity for support. That will be interesting news to the millions of supporters of the Townsend plan. That position, no doubt, will appeal (like hell) to the reasoning of the thousands of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, who in Ohio pioneered for and supported manfully old-age-pension legislation. These chamber of commerce fellows are not only opposed to the methods to be used in humanely dealing with the aged but if the truth be known they are opposed to the principle as well. What care they about the unfortunate aged so long as big business profits, crushes, and monopolizes, and they continue to clip the coupons.

Naturally they are opposed to the Rayburn-Wheeler bill which contemplates the abolition of predatory holding companies. Naturally on an issue of such prime importance to the millions of hard-working consumers of electric energy, light, and power supplied by the Morgans, the Dohertys, and others of their ilk, we expect to find the chamber of commerce on the side of the millionaire holders of plutocratic wealth. We would be disappointed had they assumed any other attitude. We expect also to find them lined up with the rich opponents of the Wagner labor-disputes bill. This bill, if enacted into law, would be something for those millions of toilers who actually create wealth and ultimately pay all the taxes. This bill would give labor the same right to an honest, fair hearing before their duly selected supreme courts as is now given to the big industrialists and big business men under certain practices of N. R. A. and its repeal of the Sherman antitrust laws.

Always found in the ranks of those rich and powerful enemies of American agriculture, we would again be disappointed should they have shown an inclination to support the A. A. A. and its consequent processing taxes. Regardless of whether you believe the A. A. A. to be wise and sound you must admit that its provisions, coupled with the drought of the past year, have resulted in much higher prices to the farmer. This is a fact and not an idle utterance. The only regret that I can express in this connection is the failure to make ample provision by Government to prevent city consumers from being robbed through the monopoly and machinations of the food trusts and chain outfits, such as the gambling grain dealers of the Chicago Board of Trade, the racketeering of the Chicago meat packers, and the lootings of the Wall Street owners of the grocery chain stores. The prevailing levels of basic agricultural commodities must be maintained and the purchasing power of American consumers elevated to that same level, then prosperity will in very truth be with us all.

Let the boasted and widely heralded opposition of the United States Chamber of Commerce to the recovery features of President Roosevelt and his new deal serve notice on the 80,000,000 people who are either without jobs, without incomes, without property, or without wealth, that it is they in reality whom the chamber is fighting. The aims, ambitions, and hopes of this nefarious organization are wholly selfish and greedy, so govern yourselves accordingly. Whenever they are against Roosevelt, then you be for him. Rededicate your loyalty to that matchless leader who is your best hope and best opportunity to strike off forever the serfdom and economic slavery of capitalistic big business. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6718) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes", that are in disagreement, disagrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, agrees to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. SMITH, Mr. KEYES, and Mr. NYE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SOCIAL SECURITY AND PUERTO RICO

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and incorporate therein several letters from the President of the United States, President Green, of the American Federation of Labor, and Secretary Ickes, in regard to the industrial and social security of Puerto Rico.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Puerto Rico?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to appeal to the Members of Congress once again in behalf of Puerto Rico, which is an organized Territory of the United States, considered as an integral part of this Nation by reason of the citizenship its people enjoy.

I especially make this appeal in view of the introduction in Congress of bills affecting the economic and social security of the country as a whole, and, in particular, do I wish to emphasize that the definition of the United States in all these bills should include Puerto Rico. It has been held by the United States Supreme Court that Puerto Rico is a complete, organized Territory. There also must be taken into consideration the organic act of March 2, 1917, known as the "Jones Act", in which appears this provision:

> The statutory laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect in Puerto Rico as in the United States.

A social and economic measure of so great an importance as H. R. 7260, a bill to provide for the general welfare by establishing old-age benefits, and by enabling the States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, should be extended to Puerto Rico, as was originally done in a previous bill of this nature, H. R. 4120, and in similar bills introduced by Senator WAGNER and Congressmen MEAD and LEWIS, in which the definition of "State" included Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia. And in this regard I should like to insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks correspondence explaining the thoughts of the President and others concerning the extension of such legislation to Puerto Rico, as follows:

APRIL 10, 1935.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I feel it my duty to call to your attention a matter of great importance to the masses of Puerto Rican workers. My appeal at this time is in connection with the social-security legislation recommended by you, which the House already has begun to consider.

I refer to the provisions of House bill No. 7260, reported by Chairman DOUGHTON, which contains a definition of the United States, embracing Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia, but it does not include Puerto Rico. Chairman DOUGHTON's original bill and similar bills introduced by Senator WAGNER and Congressmen MEAD and LEWIS do include Puerto Rico.

Now, I feel, Mr. President, that it is not wise to exclude the people of the island from participating in the obligations, responsibilities, and benefits of so far-reaching a national measure of a social and economic character, not only from the standpoint of fairness but also to instill the principles of progress, humanity, and social education.

I request, Mr. President, and I trust that your recognized sense of fairness and justice will lead Your Excellency to find the best way of recommending the incorporation of Puerto Rico in the definition of the United States into this humanitarian measure.

Very respectfully and sincerely yours,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS.

APRIL 10, 1935.

Mr. WILLIAM GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I have to appeal to you at this moment with reference to House bill No. 7260, introduced by Chairman DOUGHTON, which deals with the social security legislation. This bill, as reported out of the committee by Chairman DOUGHTON, does not include the Territory of Puerto Rico in its definition of the United States, although its provisions are extended to Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia.

A previous bill H. R. 4120, of this character, also introduced by Chairman DOUGHTON, at which hearings you testified, and similar bills introduced by Senator WAGNER and Congressman MEAD, all included Puerto Rico in this way: "As used in this title, the term 'State' shall include Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia."

Certainly Puerto Rico, an organized Territory, whose people are citizens of the United States, is an integral part of the United States, and in all fairness and justice the people of Puerto Rico should be permitted to participate in the benefits as well as in the obligations and responsibilities of so far-reaching a social program.

In this connection may I prevail to the extent of asking you to write to the chairman of the committee who is in charge of the above-stated bill and the labor Members of the House who will consider and vote for the foregoing measure, requesting them to favor the inclusion of Puerto Rico in this legislation?

I assure you that the working people of the island and I should be very much obliged to you and the American Federation of Labor, as ever in the past, for granting the above request.

With renewed assurances of my high esteem and with kind personal regard, I am,

Fraternally yours,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 25, 1935.

Hon. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico,
House Office Building.

MY DEAR MR. IGLESIAS: I have your letter of April 10, in which you call my attention to the omission of Puerto Rico from the provisions of H. R. 7260, although Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia are included.

I very much regret this omission. However, you will be interested to know that as soon as the original draft of the bill was prepared, the Division of Territories and Island Possessions of the Department of the Interior took up this matter with solicitors of the Department, and is submitting an amendment which, if adopted, will rectify this situation insofar as Puerto Rico is concerned.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 13, 1935.

Hon. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: As a reply to your letter dated April 10, I am enclosing a copy of a communication which I sent to Chairman DOUGHTON, of the House Ways and Means Committee, and copy of a letter which I addressed to Hon. WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr., Chairman of the House Committee on Labor.

In addition, I am asking our legislative representatives to call upon our friends in Congress to join in the movement to secure the inclusion of Puerto Rico within the provisions of the social-security legislation to which you have called my attention.

Very sincerely yours,

WILLIAM GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 13, 1935.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I wish very much that the provisions of the social-security legislation recommended by the Ways and Means Committee would be extended to the people of Puerto Rico.

H. R. 4120 as originally introduced provided that, "As used in this title the term 'State' shall include Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia." I understand that the social-security measure as recommended by your committee does not include the Territory of Puerto Rico in its definition of the United States, notwithstanding that its provisions are extended to Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia.

There does not seem to be any good reason why the people of Puerto Rico should be excluded from the benefits of the social-justice provisions of this legislation herein referred to. May I ask, in the name of labor and of the organization of labor in Puerto Rico, that you favor the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the provisions of the social-security legislation recommended for enactment by the House Ways and Means Committee.

Very sincerely yours,

WILLIAM GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 13, 1935.

Hon. WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr.,
Chairman Committee on Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I enclose a copy of a letter which I addressed to Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, which is self-explanatory.

I just cannot understand why Puerto Rico should be excluded from the benefits of the social-security legislation recommended by the House Ways and Means Committee. If the people of Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia are to be beneficiaries of this legislation, what good reason could be offered the people of Puerto Rico and their friends in the United States as to why the Territory of Puerto Rico is excluded from the benefits and provisions of this legislation and its provisions?

I ask you and the friends of labor of the House of Representatives to unite in making a vigorous fight for the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the benefits and provisions of the social security legislation now pending in Congress.

Thanking you in advance, I beg to remain,

Very sincerely yours,

WILLIAM GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

[Radiogram received Apr. 23, 1935]

No. 159. SAN JUAN, April 23.

GRUENING,
Division of Territories and Island Possessions:

Please transmit following message to Gov. Blanton Winship: Wagner social-security bill already passed the House pending action of Senate. Puerto Rico not included in benefits of bill. Health department has insular funds to match appropriations for maternity and public-health work. Urgent that bill be amended in Senate to include Puerto Rico. United States Public Health Service now contributes $25,000 toward support of public-health units in 12 municipalities. If Puerto Rico is not included in this bill, this money will not be available after June 30, 1935.

HORTON, Acting Governor.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 24, 1935.

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
Chairman Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: Enclosed is a draft of a proposed amendment to H. R. 7260, the social-security bill.

The amendment relates to titles I, IV, V, and VI, dealing with grants for old-age assistance, aid to dependent children, maternal and child welfare, and public health work. The bill in its present form provides for grants for these purposes to the States, the District of Columbia, Alaska, and Hawaii, but not to the insular possessions. The proposed amendment would extend the definition of the term "State", where used in these titles, to include Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

The need for aid of this sort in those possessions is at least as great as in the States and Territories. It is demonstrable by figures that in the case of Puerto Rico the actual need per capita is very much greater than in any State of the Union. Puerto Rico has suffered particularly from legislation designed to benefit the American people as a whole, to the cost of which Puerto Rico has contributed, but the benefits of which were not applicable to its citizens. There seems to be no just reason for discriminating against these possessions. Indeed, because of their lack of representation in Congress, it seems to me that we should be particularly solicitous that they do not suffer economically through their lesser political status.

In the original economic-security bill, H. R. 4120, Puerto Rico was included among the "States" entitled to grants under the titles corresponding to titles I, IV, and V. In the present bill, H. R. 7260, Puerto Rico has been excluded and the amounts authorized to be appropriated have been somewhat reduced. The proposed amendment would restore the amounts authorized to be appropriated in those titles in the original bill, in order to make some provision for the needs of the island possessions.

I am advised by Mr. A. J. Altmyer, Second Assistant Secretary of Labor, on behalf of Miss Perkins, the Chairman of the President's Committee on Economic Security, that "the Committee on Economic Security has never given specific consideration to the question of whether the security legislation should cover the Territories and possessions of the United States", and that he believes, therefore, that I am free to make such recommendations on this subject as I deem proper.

In view of the urgent need for aid of this sort, so essential to social security in these possessions, I strongly recommend that this amendment be given favorable consideration.

I have transmitted to Senator HARRISON, as Chairman of the Committee on Finance, a similar letter advising him of the facts and recommending that this amendment be adopted. For your convenience, I am enclosing a copy of my letter to Senator HARRISON.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. TYDINGS (by request) to House bill no. 7260, the social-security bill:

On page 2, line 5, to strike out "$49,750,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,000,000."

On page 19, line 23, to strike out "$24,750,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000,000."

On page 25, line 6, to strike out "$3,800,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000,000."

On page 30, line 13, strike out "$2,850,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000,000."

On page 59, line 13, after "Columbia", insert a semicolon and the following: "and when used in titles I, IV, V (except section 531) and VI, the term 'State' includes, in addition, Puerto Rico and the Virigin Islands."

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, the importance to the continental United States for having the social-security bill extended to Puerto Rico may readily be seen through the channels of our commercial intercourse.

The per capita purchases of Puerto Rico from the United States are higher than the combined per capita purchases of all Central and South American countries plus Mexico. In 1931 Puerto Rico ranked ninth in the world in value purchases from the United States and sixth in the world in total volume of trade with this Nation. The latest statistics just issued places Puerto Rico as the best customer of the United States in all Spanish-speaking countries. It ranks eighth in the world in total purchases from the United States.

Two-thirds of the profits derived from the 1,600,000 Puerto Rico consumers flow back and remain in the hands of continental business men. This, coupled with the great difference in prices of commodities between the island and the mainland, is a back-breaking burden, indeed, to the people of Puerto Rico. This difference is a consequence of the rise in the prices of commodities in the United States, a result of the operation of the major recovery acts. It represents an indirect taxation which we have estimated to approximate $18,000,000 a year, exclusive of the usual revenues to the mainland.

I have been requested by representatives of the Puerto Rican Legislature to submit to the Congress and to the administrative authorities in Washington for their attention and consideration that when the legislation for the rehabilitation and social-security program become effective it be extended to Puerto Rico.

We feel and believe that Puerto Rico has the right to respectfully demand that its people be included in any social-security or rehabilitation plan contemplated for the several States of the Union.

The majority of people of Puerto Rico, as represented by the legislature, have the greatest confidence in the manifest fairness of the President and the Congress. The legislature and the people in general are extremely anxious to do their part in the prosecution of these projects, which are of so far-reaching a social and economic consequence, in order to assure the highest integration and coordination between the legislative and administrative authorities of the insular government and those of the Federal Government.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1935.

Hon. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Delegate from Puerto Rico,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DELEGATE IGLESIAS: Enclosed you will find copy of a letter I have received from Mr. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, in answer to mine calling attention to the omission of Puerto Rico from the social security bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON's answer is self-explanatory.

Very truly yours,

WM. GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 19, 1935.

Mr. WILLIAM GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GREEN: Your letter of recent date was duly received, and I note what you say regarding the omission of Puerto Rico from the provisions of H. R. 7260, the social-security bill.

It is true that the original bill included Puerto Rico in some of the titles and was excluded in others, among which was the title dealing with unemployment insurance.

During the consideration of the bill in executive session the change was made so that the definition and treatment of Puerto Rico would be the same as under our revenue laws, inasmuch as the bill contains provisions providing for income and excise taxes. This was done because Puerto Rico has its own tax law and does not pay any taxes into the Treasury of the United States.

The committee felt that this change should be made in view of the fact that many of the benefits provided in the bill were dependent in a great measure upon the tax features. It was felt that questions involved in this matter might be ironed out later.

I regret my delay in acknowledging receipt of your letter. Such delay has been due to the fact that my time has been almost completely taken up for the past few days in connection with the consideration of the bill in the House.

Yours very truly,

R. L. DOUGHTON, Chairman.

I want to quote from the address of the President some of the thoughts that are applicable to Puerto Rico as well as to the mainland, as follows:

We find our population suffering from old inequalities, little changed by past sporadic remedies. In spite of our efforts and in spite of our talk, we have not weeded out the overprivileged and we have not effectively lifted up the underprivileged. Both of these manifestations of injustice have retarded happiness. No wise man has any intention of destroying what is known as the "profit motive"; because by the profit motive we mean the right by work to earn a decent livelihood for ourselves and for our families.

* * * * * * *

In defining immediate factors which enter into our quest, I have spoken to the Congress and the people of three great divisions:

1. The security of livelihood through the better use of the national resources of the land in which we live.
2. The security against the major hazards and vicissitudes of life.
3. The security of decent homes.

* * * * * * *

Closely related to the broad problem of livelihood is that of security against the major hazards of life. Here also a comprehensive survey of what has been attempted or accomplished in many nations and in many States proves to me that the time has come for action by the National Government. I shall send to you, in a few days, definite recommendations based on these studies. These recommendations will cover the broad subjects of unemployment insurance and old-age insurance, of benefits for children, for mothers, for the handicapped, for maternity care, and for other aspects of dependency and illness where a beginning can now be made.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF PUERTO RICO,
San Juan, P. R., April 22, 1935.

Hon. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Legislature of Puerto Rico in its last session approved the concurrent resolution entitled:

"To petition the President of the United States of America, Franklin D. Roosevelt, through the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico, Hon. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, to exert his good offices so that the Federal Government establish and maintain a national park in the municipality of Guanica in commemoration of the landing of the American troops for the first time in Puerto Rico, the year 1898, and for other purposes."

In accordance with the disposition of same I have the honor to send you herewith copy enrolled and signed of the above-mentioned concurrent resolution for the Honorable President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and additional copy for Your Honor.

Respectfully,

ANTONIO ARROYO,
Secretary House of Representatives.

GOVERNMENT OF PUERTO RICO,
BUREAU OF TRANSLATIONS,
San Juan, Puerto Rico, April 8, 1935.

George W. Roberts, chief of the bureau of translations of the Legislature of Puerto Rico, hereby certifies to the Governor of Puerto Rico, and Luis A. Deliz, assistant chief of the said bureau, certifies to the president of the Senate and to the speaker of the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico, that each of them has duly compared the English and Spanish texts of a certain act (H. C. R. 9, reconsidered) of the third session of the Thirteenth Legislature of Puerto Rico, entitled "Concurrent resolution petitioning the President of the United States of America, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, through the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico in Washington, the Honorable SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, to use his good offices to the end that the Federal Government may establish and favor a national park in the municipality of Guanica to commemorate the arrival of the American troops in Puerto Rico for the first time, in the year 1898, and for other purposes", and finds that the same are full, true, and correct versions of each other.

GEO. W. ROBERTS,
Chief, Bureau of Translations.

Concurrent resolution petitioning the President of the United States of America, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, through the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico in Washington, the Honorable Santiago Iglesias, to use his good offices to the end that the Federal Government may establish and favor a national park in the municipality of Guanica to commemorate the arrival of the American troops in Puerto Rico for the first time, in the year 1898, and for other purposes

Whereas the American troops landed for the first time at the port of Guanica on July 25, 1898, that date marking the most fundamental transformation in the political, economic, and social development of the island of Puerto Rico;

Whereas with the invasion of the American forces, Puerto Rico passed from the Spanish monarchy to enjoy a new era of progress under the Stars and Stripes;

Whereas it is logical, natural, and human to consecrate that spot as an historical relic so that future generations may meet there to recall such a glorious epoch;

Whereas the people of Puerto Rico, because of the acute crisis through which it is passing, has no resources for undertaking such an extensive work;

Whereas under the rehabilitation plan put in force by the highest magistrate of the American Nation, work could thus be given to hundreds of workmen, paid with funds appropriated for the Puerto Rico Emergency Relief Administration: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico (the Senate of Puerto Rico concurring):

First. To petition the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, as he is hereby petitioned, through the Resident Commissioner in Washington, to use his good offices to the end that the Federal Emergency Administration established in Puerto Rico proceed immediately to prepare the necessary land in the town of Guanica and to establish thereon a national park and raise a monument in commemoration of the landing of the American troops in Puerto Rico for the first time.

Second. That copies of this resolution be sent to the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico in the United States of America.

RAFAEL ALONSO TORRES,
Speaker House of Representatives.
R. MARTÍNEZ NADAL,
President of the Senate.

A REPUBLICAN REPLY TO ROOSEVELT

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech by my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] over the radio on last Wednesday night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Hon. HAMILTON FISH, Jr., of New York, at Buffalo, N. Y., May 1, 1935:

Of all the speeches or statements ever made or issued from the White House by a President of the United States, regardless of party affiliations, that made over the radio Sunday night by President Roosevelt is the most misleading and is the all-time high-water mark of sheer propaganda in the new-deal administration famous for its intense, variegated, and extensive propaganda. For 2 years the American people have been dominated by propaganda, largely emanating from hundreds of paid publicity agents on the Government pay roll—in other words, paid out of the Treasury of the United States—to prepare and get out propaganda in defense of the new-deal policies every hour of the day and night in the press and over the radio. The people back home have been literally swamped and overwhelmed by this inspired partisan ballyhoo, to the effect that Roosevelt and recovery were synonymous.

The Lord only knows that every American is anxious for recovery and the reemployment of 11,000,000 loyal and industrious wage earners who are now walking the streets looking for jobs. The people elected President Roosevelt because they wanted a change in the midst of the depression, and you cannot blame them for that. Furthermore, they wanted President Roosevelt to succeed and hoped that the new-deal policies would restore confidence and put American men and women back to work. For the first 3 or 4 months the present administration gave every appearance and assurance of success. Ninety percent of the American people looked upon the President as a Moses almost divinely sent to lead us out of the economic wilderness. Then, all of a sudden the President began to repudiate, one after the other, the main planks of his party platform; a reduction of 25 percent of the running expenditures of the Government; sound money to be preserved at all hazards; to stop borrowing and deficits; reduction in the number of commissions; and, finally, a balanced Budget.

Within 6 months he brought to Washington a lot of radicals, Socialists, and near-Communists who had never been affiliated with the Democratic Party before, and placed them in key positions in the Government service. He then inaugurated a series of unsound, radical, and socialistic measures that have all but destroyed business confidence, increased unemployment, impoverished the people, devoured our resources, and impaired the national credit.

For the first 2 years the people hoped against hope that these alien new-deal policies of regimentation, collectivism, and State socialism would succeed and put people back to work. That is the big issue, and if these imported foreign forms of socialism had restored confidence and jobs, even at the cost of $15,000,000,000, no Republican could afford to criticize or condemn them.

The only thing that counts in war is success in battle, from the moment a soldier puts on a uniform and takes up his rifle. So, the test of the new-deal measures is their success in employing labor upon American standards of wages and living. The deplorable facts are beginning to trickle through the mass barrage of propaganda to the people back home that there are a million and a half more unemployed than a year ago, according to the nonpartisan figures of the American Federation of Labor, and that instead of Roosevelt being synonymous with recovery, the new-deal measures have broken down and are tragic failures, retarding recovery, prolonging the depression, and bringing distress and devastating debts upon the people and the country.

The time has come to tell the truth and let the chips fall where they may. I do not offer any apology for presenting the facts to the people back home and differing from the President on numerous points and statements. There are some stanch upholders of the new deal—I purposely do not say the old Jeffersonian Democratic Party that believed in free speech and free institutions—who seem to think that it is a form of treason to tell the truth and that the American people back home are not entitled to the facts. It is not only the right, but the duty of the Republican Party to expose the failure of these unsound, unworkable, and socialistic new-deal policies and experiments, and, in spite of the honeyed words, fireside chats, and mass propaganda to show without fear or favor that the only way to restore business confidence in America is by applying sound American principles and stop experimenting at the expense of the people and increasing unemployment.

I would not go on the radio this evening, except that when the President speaks he is listened to by many millions of people, and it would be an act of cowardice and stupidity if some Republican in Congress did not challenge some of his definite assertions and comment on them. The radio audience may go weeks or months without hearing the other side, and public opinion may be formed on statements left unchallenged.

Let us begin at the beginning of the President's message, when he stated: "The administration and the Congress are not proceeding in any haphazard fashion in this task of government." Why, that is one of the main objections to the new deal and to Congress, which has surrendered its legislative powers and control over the purse strings, betrayed representative government and left itself no more constitutional power than Gandhi has clothing. Both the administration and the Congress have become a madhouse, attempting one radical experiment on top of another, on the basis of expediency and not experience, without any general plan for actual recovery but a multitude for piling debt upon debt and borrowing billions, more billions, and still more billions without any thought of extinguishing the debt and the inevitable day of reckoning, of ruinous inflation, chaos, bankruptcy, and repudiation.

The President further stated: "The objective of the Nation has changed in the last 3 years. Before that time individual self-interest and group selfishness were paramount in public thinking. The general good was at a discount." That assertion should take first prize at a commencement-day exercise in a kindergarten. Yes, Mr. President, it is just great and we are all for it, but what about the swarms of Democratic national committeemen who descended on Washington like bees after honey until even rebuked from the White House? What about the crowded hotels filled with deserving Democrats, lobbyists, selfish interest, and special privilege, all looking for bigger and better hand-outs from the people's money? There is an orgy of "squandermania" prevalent in Washington and not protected by civil-service regulations, which national Chairman James Aloysius Farley and the pure new-deal administration has wiped out.

We are in the midst of a government of subsidy, by subsidy and for special groups and selfish interests beyond anything that has ever existed in the history of the Republic. Shades of Calvin Coolidge and Thomas Jefferson!

I quote the President again: "For the first time in 5 years relief rolls have declined instead of increased during the winter months." In this connection the President conveniently omits figures. The official relief estimates of the F. E. R. A. in January were 20,670,000—an all-time high—February 20,523,000, March 20,440,000, a slight decrease due probably to the seasonal pick-ups in the Southern States. The President forgot to state that a year ago there were only 13,539,000 on relief, and two million on the C. W. A. projects, a tremendous increase in 1 year.

Then the President says that: "Many million more people have private work today than 1 year ago today." The figures of the American Federation of Labor, a nonpartisan organization, as stated before, deny and refute this assertion of the President. In fact, after the colossal expenditure of over $10,000,000,000 to try to create jobs there are over a million more unemployed on private work than a year ago.

The President repeated his request for the extension of the N. R. A. without suggesting limitations. This once holy and sacred institution above reproach is being condemned by Democrats, such as Senators Glass, Byrd, Tydings, and King, Governor Talmadge, of Georgia—practically the adopted State of the President—former Secretary of State Bainbridge Colby and I could also refer to HUEY LONG, but he has a habit of speaking for himself. All of these prominent Democrats have joined the swelling chorus in repudiating the N. R. A. as a failure and demanding that it be wiped out or be drastically modified, keeping the minimum-wages and maximum-hours and child-labor provisions. It is not necessary for a Republican to point out that the N. R. A. has hampered and harassed industry and all but strangled the small business man. The Blue Eagle has become a Soviet vulture, backed by force and coercion, spies, enforcement agents, and jail sentences.

In referring to the public-utility holding-company legislation, the President said: "I consider this legislation a positive recovery measure." There is apparently a difference of opinion between the point of view of the President and the insurance companies who own millions of these securities, as do innumerable American investors, who are fearful that they will be wiped out. The President goes on to say "even more significantly, it has given the country as a whole an uneasy apprehension of overconcentrated economic power." Paraphrasing that statement, I can appropriately say that "the country as a whole is uneasy because of the growing and overconcentrated powers of the Chief Executive."

The President asks for the immediate passage of the centralized banking bill, which is another step toward state socialism and in defiance of every Jeffersonian principle. It places additional power in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President, to control currency, credit, and the banks, and makes the Federal Reserve System subject to political control. Lenin said that the first step to communism is the nationalization of banks, credit, and currency, and the new banking bill has some of these aspects and earmarks. Professor Kemmerer, of Princeton, said: "I have been trying to find what the financial policy of the Democratic Party is for the last years, and have been unable to do so", and then added, "It is like trying to nail a custard pie to the wall. It just does not stick."

The President concluded his radio speech by saying that he "felt so unmistakably the atmosphere of recovery", and goes on to add: "It is the recovery of confidence in our democratic processes and institutions." Where is this confidence in recovery? What is needed is confidence, more confidence, and still more confidence—yet there is none. There is no single word of encouragement to business, to employers of labor, or to American investors. The President continues to harp on reform and trample on private business.

The restoration of business enterprise is essential to the reemployment of American wage earners and is being held back by lack of confidence and Government control. But the President refuses to give any figures on the mounting national debt or to face the problem of new taxes or balancing the Budget.

Where is the confidence referred to in the democratic institutions? The President is apparently obsessed with the idea of power. No longer emergency or temporary but permanent, autocratic, and dictatorial. The Congress has turned over to him the making of tariff schedules, power to regulate money, control of the purse strings and appropriations, and now control of banks, credit, and the wealth of the country, including the people's money—not Democratic money, not partisan money, but that of the American people.

Our separate powers of government have been scrapped for a beneficent dictator in the White House, without the consent or approval of the people.

The President said that it was necessary to go outside of Washington to get a picture of what is going on. He has to go to sea on a palatial yacht so as to understand what the people are doing and thinking. He said that Washington is the worst place to get a view of the country as a whole, in spite of the fact that the whole country is being run from Washington. Yet the President must go fishing or to the fine little Republican town of Hyde Park, in my congressional district, which long ago made up its mind that the new deal was a failure and means nothing but high cost of living, debts, deficits, taxation, borrowing, and an unbalanced Budget, confidence destroyed, and American labor unemployed.

Americans as a whole are feeling a lot better, a lot more cheerful than for many years, so the President says. Such a statement would be humorous, if it were not actually so terribly tragic and pathetic, out of the mouth of the President. Ask the 20,000,000 Americans on relief and the 11,000,000 unemployed. Ask the recent employees in the textile mills of New England and the South, who have been forced by the free-trade policies of Secretary of State Hull, for the benefit of Japanese labor paid 20 cents a day, to join the army of unemployed. Ask the share-croppers, tenant farmers, and those formerly employed in picking, ginning, transporting, and shipping cotton to our lost foreign markets. Ask the skilled labor formerly employed in the construction industry and in durable goods. Ask the American housewives, who are struggling to balance their budgets against the increase in the cost of living on foodstuffs and necessities of life, due to destruction of crops, birth control of pigs, and the new-deal program of scarcity.

Where, oh where, Mr. President, is this spirit of cheerfulness, when fear and uncertainty pervades the land under the new-deal experiments that have increased unemployment and lowered the standard of wages and of living for the American people?

BANKING ACT OF 1935

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide for the sound, effective, and uninterrupted operation of the banking system, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. WOODRUM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I do not expect to be able to say anything new at this late hour on the bill. As has been frequently said, title I deals with deposit insurance.

From 1921 to 1933 there were 15,000 bank failures in the United States, and with these failures various disastrous consequences came to the depositors of the country.

By reason of that fact there was an insistent demand throughout the country for some kind of legislation to protect the bank deposits. The condition had become such that in March 1933 there was a bank holiday. All the banks were closed, and in a short time some were able to open, others opened with restrictions, and by means of the addition of private capital, with the aid of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation they were able to open up and resume bank operations. Others fell by the wayside, and have been or are being liquidated.

As a result of the demand of that time the banking legislation of 1933 was enacted creating a bank-insurance policy in this country. We provided a permanent policy—provided for the creation of a corporation with stock which should be subscribed from three different sources. The United States itself was to take $150,000,000, the Federal Reserve banks were to take an amount equal to one-half of their surplus as of January 1, 1933, which in round numbers amounted to $140,000,000, and the insured banks were to take the balance of the stock, which if all were insured would amount to $175,000,000 or $200,000,000. That provided a corporation with a capital stock in the neighborhood of one-half billion dollars.

Now, this bill provides for a continuance of the capital set-up as it is; none of the insured banks have subscribed for any of the stock.

This act provides that the capital shall remain $150,000,000 by the United States, $140,000,000 by the Federal Reserve banks, and so this is the capital stock of the corporation provided for in this act.

This act changes the general policy from a stock subscription to an assessment plan. During the last 70 years, according to the hearings we had, the losses amounted, on account of commercial-bank failures in this country, to about one-third of 1 percent of the total deposits, and it is significant to know that half or two-thirds of the entire loss during the period of 70 years occurred in the 4 years preceding June 1934.

This act fixes the assessment at one-eighth of 1 percent of the total deposit liability of the insured banks.

It is estimated that that will bring in a fund of approximately $50,000,000 annually.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman inform the committee what the assessment was when the bill was first submitted to the committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. When it was first submitted to the committee this bill provided for an assessment of one-twelfth of 1 percent, with the power and authority to reduce that assessment. Now, the committee considered that matter very carefully and reached the conclusion that one-eighth of 1 percent was a reasonable requirement; not only reasonable but necessary. It must not be forgotten that under the present law, if it went into effect and was not changed, the insured banks would have to subscribe to the stock of this corporation to the extent of one-half of 1 percent, and then be liable, in addition to that, to whatever assessment was necessary. Some of the banks of the country have objected to this assessment of one-eighth of 1 percent. The committee has felt that that, to say the least, is a reasonable assessment and a necessary one. Not only that, but you all know, as a matter of common knowledge, and it is a matter of evidence in our hearings, that the banks of this country, under the direction of the Federal Reserve order and the Insurance Deposit Corporation also, have reduced the interest that they paid on time deposits. Not only that, but they are absolutely failing to pay any interest at all under these orders on demand deposits. By reason of that action the banks of this country last year saved at least two or three hundred thousand dollars at the expense of the depositors.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is making a splendid statement. However, the hearings disclose that the saving to the banks, through the operation of the provisions of law denying them the right, or permitting them to pay interest on demand deposits, amounts to more than $500,000,000. That is the repeated testimony before the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the gentleman. In view of that fact, it comes with very poor grace from the banks of this country to object to an assessment of one-eighth of 1 percent annually not only to take care of the current expenses and losses during normal times but it is hoped and expected to build up a reserve sufficient to take care of losses under abnormal conditions, during depressions and times of stress and strain.

As you all know, the insurance under title I is limited to $5,000. It has been stated, and I want to state it again, that that will insure about 98 percent of the depositors. It will insure 44 percent of the entire deposits in the insured banks. I want to add this to that statement: According to the last report of the Federal Insurance Deposit Corporation—I do not think it is a matter of record, but according to its report, an insurance of $5,000 on deposits will insure 80 percent of the deposits in over 9,500 banks of the country and will insure 75 percent of the deposits in over 12,000 banks. So it is seen that this provision will not only insure practically all depositors but it will also insure a large percentage of deposits in a great number of banks throughout the country.

There is another vital thing in connection with title I which I did not intend to discuss at all, but since it seems that there is a move on foot to try to amend this act, requiring membership in the Federal Reserve System as a condition precedent for membership in the Insurance Corporation, I want to say a few things about that. It has been a strange thing to me that just as soon as we have insurance of bank deposits the question arises that in order to secure the benefits of that a bank must be a member of the Federal Reserve System. We have had the Federal Reserve System in existence for over 20 years. During that entire time less than 1,000—I believe 960 banks in this country have seen fit to come into the System. There are approximately 9,000 banks outside of it. I am not opposed to a bank coming into the System. It may be helpful in the long run. It may help to control the monetary system and credit policy of this country to have them all members of one system; but I will tell you what I do object to: I am absolutely opposed to using the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation as a club over the heads of the nonmember banks of this country; to beat them into the Federal Reserve System against their will and over what they consider to be their best interests. That is not right, but yet it has been linked up with the insurance proposition ever since the question has been before the Congress. Now, if it is indispensable, if it is necessary, if it is important that all the banks of this country become members of the Federal Reserve System, then let us join the issue on that and that alone. Let it stand upon its own merits. If that is necessary and indispensable, let us fight it out; but let us not join it in with a measure here which seeks to give insurance to all banks alike.

Under the present law, you understand, all nonmember banks must come into the Federal Reserve System on or before July 1, 1937, or get out of the Insurance Corporation. Every time that measure has been submitted to Congress during the last sessions, the House has voted almost unanimously to permit nonmember banks to join the Insurance Corporation without being members of the Federal Reserve System. The provision has been put in over at the other end of the Capitol and in conference. I am not criticizing them for that, but it is a fact that that is true.

Now, our friends talk about some of these small nonmember banks being unstable and unsound. It may be freely admitted that during the last decade and a half many small banks were organized in communities where resources were not sufficient to justify the organization of a bank, and some of them, by reason of bad management, were not able to prosper.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Have not those banks been all squeezed out by this time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. I was just coming to that. There is no question about that. Sometimes the insinuation has been made that some of the smaller banks have not been safe and sound. As suggested by the gentleman, during the last 10 years all those unnecessary and needless banks—and it may be freely admitted that there were such—and those that came under bad management, have passed entirely out of the picture, and they are out of it now. But in behalf of the smaller banks of this country, coming as I do from a rural community, a district of small towns, let me say that there are thousands of small banks throughout this Nation that are just as sound and safe, within the limits of their commitments and within the scope of their activities, as the largest banks in the big cities. [Applause.]

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. Like the gentleman, I, too, have had some experience in farming communities. Is it not a fact that the knowledge the banker in a small community has of his client insures greater safety for that small bank than is found in the average city bank which deals largely in stocks or bonds, and investments of that type?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no question but what the gentleman from California is right. Some of the safest banks in the country are the smaller banks. Mere bigness does not make a safe bank; and, for that matter, the most disastrous and devastating consequences that have come to this Nation have been by reason of the failure of the big banks rather than small banks. It comes with poor grace from the spokesman of the big banks of this country to talk about the failure of the small banks. There are other reasons why small banks fail. I will now discuss them.

There were two prime factors or conditions that figured in the failure of many small banks that otherwise should and would have weathered the storm. The big banks were not subjected to either of these blighting and devastating conditions or causes. One condition was brought upon the small banks by the deliberate and willful action of the big banks in violating every confidence and betraying every trust. The other factor was largely political and the small banks could not command the necessary influence. The big banks were able to extricate themselves from the difficulty by their unconscionable imposition upon the smaller banks and by political pull and power.

Let us now look at banking conditions from 1921 to 1933 and see why there was, perhaps, a larger percentage of failures among small banks. The large institutions during that period were not so much concerned about how many farm mortgages were foreclosed; how many home owners lost their homes or how many small banks failed. During that time the big banks were engaging in international transactions and were obsessed with the idea that prosperity was unbounded, that the accumulation of excess profits in the hands of a few men was unlimited; that wealth and ease could be attained by speculation. During that same period the banks in the smaller communities were bearing the burdens and subjected to the strains placed upon them because of depressed prices of farm products, and the plight of many small industries. They were not able to make themselves heard. These things were not heeded by the big concerns. But in 1931 when they awoke to find themselves in danger, when they found out that their backs were to the wall, when they realized that they had been living in a fool's paradise, it was then that they threw up their hands and shouted that the Government must save them in order to preserve the financial structure of the Government. They were the crew that scuttled the ship and then deserted it. When the storm clouds were darkest and thickest and the danger greatest, they were the ones who scurried to shelter. It was then that they came to the administration and Congress with the plea that a Government agency must be established to save them. As a result, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was created. The Treasury of the United States was opened to them. Not to help the small banks or the people but to save the big banks. Even when loans were made to smaller banks, the funds were used to pay off their obligations to the larger ones and not to help the community. If the Government had not come to their relief there may have been a larger ratio of failures among the big banks. The small banks could not bring the political pressure to bear and could not get the aid when they were needy and languishing. In the face of that record, it now ill becomes the spokesmen of big banks to cast aspersions upon the smaller ones.

There is one other thing that should be said. During the wild orgy of investment and speculation, the smaller banks were looking to their correspondent banks for advice and counsel in making investments, just as has always been true. The larger concerns by reason of their wider experience and because of their closer contact with the financial and industrial leaders of the Nation and those in charge of governmental policies were in a position to know the real value of securities better than the country banker. During those days the big bankers betrayed every trust and confidence and unloaded upon the smaller ones all the depreciated bonds and worthless paper that was possible. Under those conditions, is it any wonder that we had a large number of failures among the small banks?

They ask about the number of failures; they ask if there have not been more failures in nonmember banks than among member banks of the Federal Reserve System. Naturally so, because there are 10 times as many nonmember banks. During the 20 years the Federal Reserve System has been in existence, as I stated a while ago, less than 1,000 banks have come into the System. At this point, Mr. Chairman, I wish to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, a list showing the number of State-insured banks of this country by States and showing the number of those banks that are in the Federal Reserve System and the number that are nonmember banks. Three States in this Nation have not a single reserve bank within their borders. I am now talking, of course, about State-insured banks, not national banks; not a single reserve bank is to be found within the confines of three of the States of this Union.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman explain briefly the cause for the reluctance of the small bank to become a member of the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are a number of reasons for that reluctance, in my opinion. In the first place, it requires an investment in the stock of the Federal Reserve System. In the second place they were seriously handicapped and hampered by the exchange rates they are able to charge and which is a material source of income to the small banks. In the third place they were afraid of being continually harassed by continual examinations by a board located here in Washington. In my judgment, these are the three contributing causes for the small banks of this country not coming into the Federal Reserve System in greater numbers.

I started to give a short account of the systems that exist now and I said there are 3 States that do not have a single Reserve bank in them. There are 2 other States that have but 1 Federal Reserve bank each; there is 1 State that has 2; 2 States that have only 3; 6 that have only 4; while Illinois heads the list of States having the most nonmember banks with its 507; and my own State of Missouri comes second with 498. I will insert this list in the RECORD in connection with my remarks so you can see for yourselves, if you want to take the time to look at it, how few member banks there are in your individual States. For this reason I say that they should not be required to come into the Federal Reserve System in order to enjoy the benefits of this deposit-insurance fund.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. CARPENTER. Can the gentleman give me any assurance, at least so far as he is concerned, that should the Senate write into this bill a provision requiring nonmember banks to come into the System by 1937, that the conferees on the part of the House will make a determined fight to eliminate such provision from the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can give the gentleman no assurance on that, because I am not one of the conferees and will not be; but I can tell him that, so far as I am concerned, and so far as my attitude in the past has been, I will join him along with the rest of the Members of this House, if we can get a majority, in holding out against any provision which requires admission into the Federal Reserve System in order to secure the benefits of deposit insurance. [Applause.]

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. I would like the gentleman's opinion as to the depositor's viewpoint. Would the depositor be more secure if his bank were a member of the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think so. I do not see any reason why he should be. There is this one fundamental principle involved; and before this debate closes I would like for some Member, the advocate of a unified banking system, some Member who has insisted upon forcing these nonmember banks into the Federal Reserve System, to show some reason why a bank that is sound, a bank that has back of it a history of approved and successful banking operations, a bank whose capital is sufficient with reference to its liabilities, a bank that is rendering a splendid service to the community in which it is located, a bank that has bright prospects for future earnings—to show some sound reason why such a bank should not be admitted to the Deposit Insurance Corporation independent of whether or not it is a member of the Federal Reserve System. This question never has been answered to my satisfaction.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am in perfect accord with the gentleman's argument, but I would like to ask him again if the monetary authority set up in title II would not be vastly damaged, practically wrecked so far as cooperation in certain States is concerned, if the Federal Reserve Board has no authority over them in carrying out this monetary plan, if the gentleman's theory prevailed?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I think not at all, because of the great army of these nonmember banks, small banks located in the small communities of this country which, the gentleman knows, do not exercise any influence or control over the monetary system or the credit policy of this Nation at all.

The fact that they are simply not members of the Federal Reserve System will make no difference at all so far as that principle is concerned.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman knows that not one bank in the United States closed by reason of having reserves in the Federal Reserve banks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Because they received 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is right.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. A great many banks were closed because they were nonmembers of the Federal Reserve System and did not have their reserves in Federal Reserve banks, but had them in city correspondent banks in the larger cities.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true. Right in that connection, when they talk about the number of banks that failed, I have no available figures, but I will tell you what I do have—and I want the Members to take note of this. When the banks closed and it became necessary to build up their capital structure in order to enable the banks of this country to open and to become members of the Insurance Corporation, what happened? It took a billion and a half dollars in private capital and R. F. C. funds to revive those banks and put them in shape so that they could open and carry on their business activities and become members of the Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Mr. Chairman, what is the fact about the matter? How much money did it take to build up the capital structure of those banks that were members of the Federal Reserve System? It is known that all national banks are members. They must be members. It took $465,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to build up the national-bank structure of this country, and in addition to that it took $238,000,000, to say nothing about the capital that was subscribed by private industry, to build up the member banks, which numbered only 960. It took $703,000,000 of the funds of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to put them on their feet in order to get them going and make them members of the Insurance Deposit Corporation, referring to the member banks of our banking system, while, on the other hand, for 7,800 nonmember banks it took only $265,000,000, which was about one-third. In other words, with one-third the capital we revived more banks outside the System than we did in the System. To my mind, that is one of the strongest arguments that mere membership in the Federal Reserve System does not make a bank sound and keep it sound.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COLDEN. In the farming towns probably the most secure assets of the banks are real-estate securities, mortgages, and deeds of trust. May I ask if the gentleman is satisfied with the provisions of this bill, which permit the use of real-estate securities for Federal Reserve collateral?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am satisfied with that feature, and I will be glad to discuss that very question briefly.

Under this bill, subject to rules and regulations of the Board, banks may make real-estate loans to the extent of 60 percent of the appraised value thereof, and each bank may make an aggregate of such loans to an amount equal to the capital and surplus, or 60 percent of the time deposits of such bank, whichever is greater. This is one of the most valuable provisions. There are thousands of small banks whose time deposits are almost if not quite as large as their demand deposits. If these banks are to continue in operation, they must loan on real-estate securities. The banks in turn, in case of need, must be able to secure loans on these real-estate mortgages as security, and that is provided for in this bill. It may be an ideal situation to have commercial and investment banking separated, but as a practical proposition that is impossible in rural communities where both activities are necessary to maintain the banks. These real-estate loans should be amortized over a long period of time, upon reasonable terms and the lowest rate of interest possible. When that is done real-estate loans will be the best and soundest, and the provisions of this bill will help remove the log jam in the current of real-estate securities.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman has made a most astonishing statement in regard to the relative soundness of the member and nonmember banks of the Federal Reserve System. I am wondering what caused that condition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I do not know the cause. However, if I have the time, I will be glad to explain some things in connection with that matter.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Could the gentleman put the information in the RECORD in an extension of his remarks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will.

Mr. DARDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DARDEN. The gentleman referred a few minutes ago to preferred stock which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had acquired in various banks. Is it not true that a great deal of this stock was not needed, but was taken at the request of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think perhaps some of it was not needed.

Mr. DARDEN. I know of several banks that had no need for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the gentleman is correct. Some of this stock was taken where it was not necessary, but the overwhelming amount, in my judgment, was used to build up a weakened bank structure in this country, and this applies, as I say, to member banks as well as nonmember banks.

Mr. DARDEN. Is it not a fact that a great deal of this money has subsequently gone into Government bonds?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the case of those banks that took it, no doubt that is true.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman inform the House by way of comparison the amount of money involved between the nonmember banks that only required the $265,000,000 and the member banks that required $760,000,000?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman have reference to deposits?

Mr. DONDERO. In size and amount of business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, most of them were smaller banks, but the number that served communities throughout the country were infinitely more. I do not mean, of course, to infer that membership in the Federal Reserve System is an element of weakness. I am not opposed, I say again, to any bank entering the System if it wants to come in, and it is entirely desirable in my opinion.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 15 additional minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I started to say a while ago there are those who believe that there is still a useful place in the community for an independent unit bank whether it is a member of the Federal Reserve System or not. A bank whose officers, directors, and stockholders live nearby. They are men who own their homes and pay taxes. Men who know the community and are interested in its growth and development. Those who know the needs and the financial responsibility of the bank's patrons. Those who are familiar with home and farm values. Those who are posted on industrial and business conditions there. Those who know the moral risks and who are acquainted with the indigent and the shiftless as well as the active and the thrifty. The men who contribute to the schools, the churches, and to charity. Those who belong to the lodges and the civic organizations. Those who are in the vanguard fighting the battle for every material improvement and advancement and for every cause that means better education, higher moral standards, civic betterment, a truer fellowship, and a better life. It is unthinkable to replace such an organization that is the very foundation and the back log of community life with a mere mechanism man, the clerk of a branch bank, the chief of which may be hundreds of miles away, and that knows nothing and cares less about the community. Still, that is the condition to which we are coming if we drive out of the community these small banks by compelling them to go into the Federal Reserve System. [Applause.]

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. COLDEN. The gentleman has described very accurately a situation that already exists in California under our chain-banking system.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I am pleased to have that contribution from the gentleman.

I had hoped briefly to discuss title II. If the Congress is ever going to recognize its duty to coin money and regulate its value, there must be established some central board somewhere that has control of the expansion and contraction of currency and credit in this Nation. You cannot delegate this authority to a divided commission. The Federal Reserve banks of this country, the individual banks, cannot do it. They ought not to do it. I am one of those who believe that when it comes to the question of a monetary policy and credit administration, this authority must be vested in a Governmental, central agency somewhere. [Applause.] I do not care what you call it, a Federal reserve board, a monetary authority, or a monetary commission, the power must be placed somewhere, and title II of this bill increases the powers of the Federal Reserve Board and places upon it the duty, so far a monetary policy and a credit administration can do it, to stabilize industry and prevent fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment. This is the goal.

I know there are those in this body who think there are too many powers delegated to the Federal Reserve Board under this act. There are those who think that there are not enough powers granted. All this controversy, Mr. Chairman, revolves around the question of the board, the commission, or the committee that has these powers.

If we could all agree upon the constitution of this Board, how it should be appointed, what powers it should have, and, above all, what is its objective or what is its goal, we would have the question solved; but right there is where we do not agree. Some of the very men who express the fear that there is too much power placed in this Board would place the same power in a private, chartered corporation like the Bank of England.

This authority, in my judgment, has got to be vested in one central body and that body, so far as I am concerned, should be a body representing the Government and the interests of the entire people of this country rather than to be controlled and influenced by any group of private bankers or business men. [Applause.]

There is no use of my arguing with any man who does not believe in placing the monetary policy and the credit administration of this Nation in the hands of a central body. There is where it must be, according to my judgment.

There is one peculiar thing about the money question, and that is, the absolute, positive, but widely divergent views that exist. You may take men who are economists and financiers. You may take the professors in our great colleges, the men who have lectured to their classes, the men who have made speeches throughout the country, the men who have written books, the men who have given their lifetime to a sincere and honest study of the money question, and they will arrive at exactly opposite poles. You may take the men who are in the business world, men who have managed banks, men who have been in charge of our big financial institutions, able business men, and their views about the money question are just as wide apart as the views that some of us entertain or, perhaps, the views of the soapbox orator, who expounds his philosophy and his views from the street corner. This is a strange thing.

There are those who believe that the powers granted here do not go far enough. There are those who believe they should place the power in the hands of this Board to engage in open-market operations in the purchase and sale of gold. There are those who believe it should have the power to issue currency direct. There are those who believe it should have the right to devalue the gold dollar and determine the amount of grains in the gold dollar. On the other hand, there are those who believe that the power granted here is too great.

The main powers that are granted here under title II to the Federal Reserve Board are the right to establish and proclaim and, if you please, enforce an open-market policy and in the second place to determine the rates of interest that shall be charged by the Federal Reserve banks and, finally, the reserves that shall be maintained by the member banks.

These are the levers of control provided in this bill to expand and contract currency and credit in the Nation.

Now, I need not discuss the manner in which they will operate. Everyone knows that if there is a stringency in the money market and if there is a demand from industry and commerce for more currency and credit, it will be the policy of the Board to buy bonds and other eligible securities and put money out on the market, making it available, and at the same time making the rate of interest as reasonable as possible and lower the reserves in the banks so that credit and currency may be made available to the legitimate demands of industry, commerce, and agriculture throughout the country. On the other hand, if there is a tendency to speculate, if the Nation is going out on a wild orgy of spending, if inflation becomes rampant, it shall be the policy of this Board to draw in the money, to sell bonds and securities, and bring the money in, raise the discount rate, make it more difficult to get money and, if necessary, impound it in the banks by raising the reserve requirements.

By these three levers it is hoped and expected that the Federal Reserve Board shall so regulate and control the expansion and contraction of currency and credit throughout the Nation as to accommodate agriculture, commerce, and industry.

That is as it should be. I think the confusion that arises is due to the fact that we fail to recognize the distinction between a monetary system and a general Nation-wide credit policy on the one hand and banking functions on the other. That is where we fail to draw the distinction. The one is a governmental function and is Nation-wide in its scope, one that should be placed in a body responsive to the Government and to the will of the people, exercising its powers and performing its duties in the formulation and enforcement of a monetary policy in the interest of all the people. The other is more or less local and should be left to the initiative of the individual and to private capital.

I do not believe in a board here in Washington going to the various banks of the country and absolutely dictating the policy with reference to loans to be carried out there. But, on the other hand, I do believe in the establishment of a Nation-wide credit policy and a central agency to have control over the monetary system, which is a governmental function.

It is one thing to set up a monetary authority with power imposed upon it and the duty of carrying out certain policies in the interest of the people of the country. It is another thing to attend to the details of bank deposits and fix the solvency of the borrowers and the liquidity and soundness of loans.

One is a Government function and the other is purely a banking matter. For that reason, in my opinion, you cannot give too much power to the governmental body that controls—not the details of the banking institution down in your community or mine, but that does establish a policy that will enable the people of this country, business, agriculture, commerce, and industry to obtain loans upon reasonable rates and make available to them currency and credit by which they can carry on legitimate operations. That must be a governmental policy.

When this legislation is passed, as I believe it will be, we will have a system which will provide, as far as monetary policy can provide, for expansion and contraction of the currency of the country.

Now, there is another question here about which there is great diversity of opinion, and that is what should be the goal, what should be the objective. I realize that there are those on the committee, as well a number of Members in the House, who are firmly convinced, and really believe, that the commodity-price level is the ultimate goal toward which we should strive. There is a difference of opinion about that. Governor Eccles, speaking as a representative of the Federal Reserve Board, does not think that that is the ultimate goal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman was leading up to the very question that has been bothering me in this bill and I want to hear the gentleman's discussion as to the elasticity of the Board in controlling the expansion and contraction of the currency. That naturally involves the amendment that will be offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

Mr. WILLIAMS. In view of the extension of time granted me, I shall read some of the expressions of Governor Eccles, the head of the Federal Reserve System, and the man at least at present at the head of this Board that will be given the power and charged with the responsibility of trying to so manipulate the monetary system and the credit policy of this country as to bring relief to us. On that question it was my privilege, as well as the privilege of a lot of other members of the committee, to ask him various questions. On pages 215 and 216 of the hearings, this language will be found. Speaking of general-commodity price level, Mr. Eccles said:

> If stable prices at some given index figure would leave an army of unemployed, it does not seem to me that this is the objective that would satisfy this country.

In response to a question whether he favored fixing a certain commodity price level as the goal, Mr. Eccles said:

> I would prefer that it be not made the central objective of the banking bill.
> Do you think it is practicable to do that?
> I don't think it is.

Further, on pages 235 and 236, Governor Eccles said:

> I don't think there should be a mandatory provision to reach a certain price level. It may be of interest in that connection to consider the preamble of the recent law creating the Bank of Canada. It is short, and might be considered as a basis for our own.

I do not quote that provision, but it is enough for me to say at this time that the provision that is placed in the newly established banking system of Canada is almost word for word the provision which we placed in this bill. That is, as I gave you the substance of it a moment ago, that the price level is not the only thing to be considered, but general business stability, so far as the monetary policy can do it, and to prevent fluctuations, not only in the price level, but in production, in wages, in trade, and above all, in my opinion, in employment.

Mr. ARNOLD. As I understand it, and I want to see whether I am correct or not, the elasticity that is vested in the Board in the bill now before us, reported by the committee, is as great as the elasticity that would be if the mandatory provision of the Goldsborough amendment were adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Much greater, in my judgment.

Mr. ARNOLD. In other words, this Board can control inflation and expansion?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. To a greater extent under the proposed bill as reported by the committee than under the Goldsborough amendment. Is that right?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that I would put it in exactly that way, but the objective to be attained, the ultimate goal, the purpose of it is not confined simply to a price level, not confined to a commodity price level. That is not the only consideration.

Mr. ARNOLD. But they could use that commodity price level if they wanted to under the bill as now reported?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; that is one of the things. To continue, in order that you may get Mr. Eccles' idea:

> I think there should be a goal, but the goal should not be a fixed price level. I don't believe that a fixed price level is a guide that we should have. We might have a stable price level on the basis of some index and yet have a great deal of unemployment.

He says on page 237:

> This is an interesting chart here that Dr. Goldenweiser gives me. It shows that the price level in England was very stable from 1931 to 1934, but the amount of their unemployment fluctuated considerably.

In other words, employment does not necessarily follow the price level, and, according to the experience of England—and that experience reflected in the recent Canadian system which has been established—they do not recognize that the price level is the only goal to be obtained. Further, Mr. Eccles says:

> I don't say that prices are not part of the consideration. I think that every effort should be made to maintain stable prices, but stable prices should not be the sole and paramount objective so that the Board would be directed to maintain stable prices and not to consider total production and employment at all.

In other words, the price level, of course, is one element in it, but let me suggest this to you. If we raise the commodity price level 20 percent, as the proponents of that theory say should be done——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the price level should be raised, as I started to say, 20 percent, as the proponents of this measure say it should be and must be, and if by reason of that commodity price level we thereby raise the cost of living to the consumers of the Nation, unless there went with that price elevation an increased purchasing power on the part of the consuming public and unless there went with it general increased employment of the people of the country, then I say, so far as we are concerned, our economic condition would be worse than it is now rather than improved.

For that reason the commodity price level is not the only goal. It is not the only thing to be considered in arriving at the objective. The objective sought in this bill is that there shall be stable business conditions; that there shall be a general economic equilibrium; that the general level, not only of commodity prices, but of wages, production, and employment shall be maintained. When that is done we shall have a general economic balance, under which we will go forward to brighter and better conditions than we have enjoyed during the last decade. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would like to ask the gentleman a question that I believe very pertinent to this feature of his very able argument. It relates to section 204, the paragraph making it the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise its powers in certain ways, which was very severely criticized by the ranking minority member of the committee, as one of the most dangerous, if not the most dangerous power conferred in the bill. I wish the gentleman would just read that section to the committee very briefly and comment on it. The gentleman has made a very able argument.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman just tell me what it is? My time is very limited.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It is paragraph (o) on page 51:

> It shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise such powers as it possesses in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to business stability and to mitigate by its influence unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action and credit administration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, that is the very thing I have been talking about.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Exactly. This paragraph has been criticized by the minority as perhaps the most dangerous paragraph in the whole bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But that is the very objective of this legislation. It may be of interest to know that there never has been written into the law any kind of an objective. There never has been a single word written into the Federal Reserve Act requiring the Board to even try to attain any kind of goal or any kind of objective. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I will be glad to yield the gentleman from Missouri 5 additional minutes if he desires to pursue that question further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, thank you.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD].

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, the closing days of the last Congress saw the enactment into law of the so-called "McLeod-Steagall compromise amendment" for the relief of depositors of receivership banks. It will be recalled that this legislation permitted the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in making loans on or purchasing the assets of closed banks, to make their appraisals of such assets "in anticipation of an orderly liquidation over a period of years, rather than on the basis of forced selling values in a period of business depression." Since the passage of this measure much has been done by the Government to alleviate the hardships and distress occasioned by the sudden freezing of billions of dollars belonging to more than 10,000,000 representative American citizens.

The liberalizing of the Government's closed-bank policy has done much to conquer the forces of the depression. Wherever the funds tied up in a closed bank have been restored to the depositors there has been a corresponding advance toward recovery.

The truth of this statement has been particularly apparent in my own city of Detroit. Since the enactment of the compromise pay-off measure the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has made possible a full pay-off to all small depositors of the two large closed banks in Detroit. The immeasurable benefits which have accrued from placing the funds of depositors in circulation again have played a most important part in enabling Detroit to take the lead in our drive for recovery.

We have heard much about the splendid assistance rendered by the Government to depositors of closed banks. The really effective and helpful aid has been greatly stressed by certain officials of the Government, while at the same time glossing over the dark side of the picture. I grant that much has already been done. I have only the highest praise for the splendid assistance rendered by the R. F. C. in making funds available to the stricken depositors of receivership banks.

However, this is no time to rest upon half-won laurels. Having gone so far in the extension of the thawing process which has allowed frozen deposits to again flow into the channels of trade and commerce, it would be a great pity if we failed to take the final step that would provide the maximum possible returns in actual, concrete recovery benefits.

By this I refer to the apparent and evident unwillingness on the part of the administration to abandon the antiquated system of liquidating closed banks which has been handed down to us as a relic of the old days when banks were closed chiefly as the result of embezzlements, robberies, or unsound assets.

While I am perfectly aware that some of the closed banks now in liquidation failed for one or more of these very same reasons, on the whole an entirely different situation prevails today. The majority of the banks now closed went into receiverships because of the world-wide depression. They closed because values toppled and fell below normal almost overnight. When the business man could no longer pay on his notes, when the farmer could no longer pay off his mortgage, when the home owner could not pay on his home, and when securities reached zero levels the banks were unable to continue.

We have seen literally thousands of banks close in the past several years for the plain and simple reason that their assets, while sound, could not be immediately converted into cash on depression markets to meet the demands of those who needed their money.

While the receivership method of liquidating closed banks may have been all right years ago, it is wholly inadequate to meet the needs of the present day. Owing to the necessity of hasty liquidating, in order to expedite pay-offs, bank receivers are unable to wait and take full advantage of the constantly increasing upward trend in price levels which is steadily enhancing the value of many closed bank assets.

This rapid-fire liquidation policy means disposing of assets on depression markets for amounts far below their normal and real values. This dissipation of the depositors' money must be stopped, and the only way in which it can be stopped is by abolition of the entire existing set-up for winding up the affairs of closed banks.

We already have the necessary governmental machinery to take over and perform in the most economical and satisfactory way the liquidation of the thousands of closed banks whose assets are steadily fading away and disappearing under present receiverships.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has already extended vitally essential aid and assistance to the depositors of more than 7,000 banks. This important and most valuable agency of the Government is best equipped to take over the problem of conserving and properly disposing of the assets of the country's closed banks. To do so would merely be the logical extension and fulfillment of a Government program which has already proved most successful.

Liquidation of bank assets by the R. F. C. would make it possible for such assets to be held long enough to take full advantage of the rising price levels. My bill, H. R. 2847, is designed to take advantage of the superior liquidating capacity of the R. F. C. Under its provisions the R. F. C. would purchase the valuable assets of closed banks outright. Assets which have become valueless would, of course, be excluded. Funds would be made immediately available to depositors. The assets would become the property of the R. F. C. and would be liquidated slowly and carefully over a period of 10 years.

The thousands of scattered receiverships would in this way be permanently abolished. Their place would be taken by the R. F. C., which would act as a single, coordinated liquidating agency to serve the interests of the depositors and of all the people in the most efficient and economical manner possible.

It has been estimated that the total amount due depositors of both National and State banks now in receiverships is about two and a half billion dollars. If present receivership methods are persisted in, it is more than a mere probability that depositors will lose more than two billion of the two and a half billion dollars still due them.

There are two sources of loss under present liquidation methods which would be eliminated by my bill. First, we have the loss entailed by dumping good, but slow, assets on subnormal depression markets. Second, we have the question of excessive liquidation expenses, including salaries, fees, and so forth.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Is it not a fact that in the one large Detroit institution that has progressed most under the Comptroller's receiver, they have organized and the Federal court has now approved a set-up of a depositor's liquidating corporation, which will prevent losses to depositors, of which the gentleman is now speaking?

Mr. McLEOD. That is correct. That same institution has already paid off the small depositors in full, 100 percent.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Of course, the gentleman knows, being familiar with the situation in the city of Detroit, that it is proposed to establish a liquidating depositors' corporation for the First National.

Mr. McLEOD. That is correct.

I do not mean to say, of course, that all receiverships are handled and managed at excessive cost to the depositors.

I do insist, however, that receivers are not in a position to wait and hold assets until the constantly increasing price levels make possible the full and complete recovery of asset values. The facts also show that many instances do exist where exorbitant fees and expenses are paid from the funds of depositors. Whether it comes from the assets or interest derived from the assets makes no difference—the money paid as liquidating expenses is lost to the depositors and comes from their funds.

While it has been shown that some receiverships have been conducted at a cost of but 2 or 3 percent, or less, the following examples show that all depositors are not so fortunate:

Olney National Bank, Hartford, Mich.:
Liquidation expenses	$14,507.46
Dividends paid	93,451.74
Modoc County Bank, Modoc County, Calif.:
Liquidation expenses	33,600.00
Dividends paid	137,000.00
Peoples National Bank, Pitcairn, Pa.:
Liquidation expenses	26,908.38
Dividends paid	175,612.98
First National Bank, Trafford, Pa.:
Liquidation expenses	19,053.13
Dividends paid	108,187.62

One of the worst instances which has come to my attention is that of a group of closed State banks in Illinois. In a survey made by the Chicago American of the closed-bank situation in Cook County, Ill., it was shown that a group of 12 institutions, known as the "Bain Banks", closed on June 9, 1931, with deposits totaling $13,000,000.

Since this group of banks closed, $461,973.35 has been paid for pay rolls and miscellaneous liquidating expenses, $176,000 for attorneys' fees, and the receiver has been paid $108,421.81, making a total liquidating expense of $746,395.16.

However, during this same period, there has been paid just $201,942.70 to depositors, an overall average of only 1½ cents on the dollar. In other words, it has cost exactly $746,395.16 to pay the depositors $201,942.70.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Those were not national banks?

Mr. McLEOD. Those were not national banks.

Naturally, such conditions are not conducive to a spirit of confidence, either among the depositors of closed banks or among the public at large. The unrest, the disquietude, and the lack of confidence engendered by the banking situation has been keeping money out of the normal channels of private enterprise and is retarding and hampering our efforts to attain complete recovery.

Furthermore, this lack of confidence has been diverting funds from private to Government channels. It has actually forced the Government to go into business and extend relief activities to provide the employment of facilities private business has been unable to provide, due to lack of funds, lack of confidence, and lack of initiative born of a well-founded belief in the stability of our present financial structure.

This statement does not lack confirmation. As an illustration, I will mention that in December 1929 postal-savings accounts totaled $164,276,392. Today, after the banking crash and vanished confidence, the American people are intrusting nearly a billion and a quarter dollars to the care of Government-protected postal-savings accounts. This, too, in spite of the fact that nearly all banks are now insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

In spite of these hindrances, enough progress has been made to show that much would be gained by liquidating closed-bank assets more slowly. We have witnessed a most encouraging upward trend in the value of many securities. We already have more than a reasonable basis for assurance that the slow and good, but frozen assets of receivership banks have already appreciated considerably in value and will continue to do so on the steadily rising markets that arrive hand in hand with the various stages and phases of economic recovery.

As an example of how values have recovered already since the worst days of the depression, I will cite the following gains made in the values of several representative securities: A glance at the stock-market quotations will show that since the depression reached its lowest point during the first quarter of 1933 American Telephone & Telegraph has risen from 87¾ to 112⅞; Bethlehem Steel common from 10⅛ to 26; Bethlehem Steel preferred from 25¼ to 64; Chrysler Motors from 7¾ to 37⅜; Eastman Kodak from 50⅛ to 140½; General Motors common from 10 to 30⅝; and General Motors preferred from 65½ to 116⅛.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. I did not just get the gentleman's point, but the gentleman said something a few moments ago about the cost of receiverships. Does the gentleman still stand upon all the newspaper statements that have been issued during the past 3 or 4 months with respect to the conduct of the Comptroller of the Currency with respect to the expenses of receiverships, fees of receivers, and fees of attorneys for receivers?

Mr. McLEOD. To which phase of the controversy does the gentleman refer?

Mr. SISSON. I refer to all the controversy which the gentleman started through the newspapers.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman is not aware that he started a controversy through the newspapers, and that is why he asked to what phase of the controversy the gentleman from New York referred.

Mr. SISSON. My recollection is not good enough to recall all of the statements that the gentleman gave to the Hearst newspapers, but, of course, the gentleman is familiar with them himself. I refer to the various criticisms which the gentleman made of the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. O'Connor, with respect to the expenses of receiverships in the city of Detroit, Mich., and the fees of attorneys for receivers, and the gentleman's statements that he was not able to obtain information from the Comptroller as to the fees of receivers and the fees of attorneys. I asked if the gentleman still stands upon all those statements that he formerly made to the newspapers.

Mr. McLEOD. I stand on the statement that the gentleman just stated, that it was impossible to ascertain figures of the cost of receiverships, which was based on a question propounded by a member of the committee, my colleague from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], on the assertion that a certain bank in Michigan, the Guardian National Bank of Commerce, was to cost in attorneys' fees something like a quarter of a million dollars. That is to what the gentleman refers.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman knows, or should know, before he made the statement, that under the law the Comptroller publishes a statement of the fees and expenses of each receivership in the banks liquidated under his direction and the fees of the attorneys for the receivers.

Mr. McLEOD. Will the gentleman answer the question, then, why it was that no Member of Congress was able to obtain the information of which he has just spoken?

Mr. SISSON. I deny that is a fact, that no Member of Congress was able to obtain it. Perhaps he was not able to obtain it immediately, but the gentleman from Michigan, as I am reliably informed, never made any request upon the Comptroller for a statement of the expenses or fees of any receivership for the liquidation of any bank.

Mr. McLEOD. If the gentleman is attempting to defend Mr. O'Connor because of a resolution I filed with the Committee on Banking and Currency asking that the expenses of receiverships be made known to this body, then that is another question.

Mr. SISSON. I will ask the gentleman now another question, inasmuch as he does not care to answer the particular question I addressed to him.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman has not stated a question.

Mr. SISSON. Would the gentleman care to appear—voluntarily, of course, for he could not be asked to appear otherwise—before the Committee on Banking and Currency and substantiate the charges he has made against the Comptroller of the Currency?

Mr. McLEOD. I am aware of the fact that the Comptroller of the Currency wrote to one or two Members of Congress, and perhaps the gentleman from New York is one of them, asking that I come before the committee and answer certain questions that have not been communicated to me.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman want to appear before the committee and substantiate his charges?

Mr. McLEOD. My charges?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; the charges the gentleman made in the Hearst newspapers.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman is mistaken in saying "the Hearst newspapers."

Mr. SISSON. I read them in the Hearst newspapers myself.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman is mistaken in his facts.

Mr. SISSON. I do not very often read the Hearst newspapers, but I read the particular Hearst papers that contained this matter.

Mr. McLEOD. If the gentleman desires to state a definite question, I shall be happy to answer it.

Mr. SISSON. I am asking the gentleman if he still stands on all the things he claimed were facts that he sent to the newspapers, whether Hearst or other newspapers, about Comptroller O'Connor and the expenses of receiverships and the fees of attorneys for receivers in the city of Detroit, Mich.

Mr. McLEOD. Yes; that is a fact.

Mr. SISSON. Then, will not the gentleman now express his willingness to appear before the Committee on Banking and Currency and substantiate those charges?

Mr. McLEOD. If the chairman of the committee were to ask me to come before the committee, I would be happy to do so. I wanted to come before the committee in support of my resolution.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman has answered; his answer is "yes."

Mr. McLEOD. This controversy referred to by the gentleman was started by Mr. O'Connor because of his personal objections to making public the information requested in my highly privileged resolution of inquiry.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman's answer, then, is "yes"; that he would like to appear before the committee and substantiate or attempt to substantiate his charges.

Mr. McLEOD. I do not retract any statement I have made during the so-called "controversy" to which the gentleman refers. Does that satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. SISSON. I am asking the gentleman if he is willing to appear before the committee and substantiate his charges; yes or no?

Mr. McLEOD. Merely for the purpose of gratifying the vindictiveness of Mr. O'Connor as evidenced by you as his spokesman, I would say "no." It would be unnecessary to appear before the committee, as the Chairman and members of the Banking and Currency Committee are present and my statements are being substantiated right here and now on the floor of the House.

Mr. SISSON. I am not his spokesman.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman acts as though he were.

Mr. SISSON. I am acting merely in the matter of fairness in representing an administrative official of this Government in this Congress.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman is attempting to act as a defender of Mr. O'Connor. Let me ask the gentleman himself a question.

Mr. SISSON. It is a question of the gentleman having made charges. If there is any basis for the charges, the gentleman should be willing to appear before the committee and substantiate them.

Mr. McLEOD. Does the gentleman refute any of the charges I made?

Mr. SISSON. That has no bearing on the issue. The law answers the gentleman's question, the law answers the gentleman's charges which have gone out through the newspapers of the country.

Mr. McLEOD. Does the gentleman deny that any of the charges I made were correct?

Mr. SISSON. I deny that each and every one of them is correct.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I understood the gentleman's resolution correctly, it merely asked the Comptroller of the Currency to give specific information as to the attorneys who represented the national banks and other information with respect to receiverships.

The gentleman stated that, so far as he was concerned, it had been rumored in his city and in other places in Michigan that certain attorneys had received upward of a quarter of a million dollars for fees and the gentleman wanted to clarify that situation by having an investigation made to determine whether any particular individual attorney had been paid such exorbitant fees in representing receivers. Is that correct?

Mr. McLEOD. That is correct.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In substantiation of that and what has gone on, I make the statement that the gentleman is perfectly correct, not only in his desire for that information but in stating that the information was necessary, because those rumors came to me; and, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I asked the Comptroller of the Currency for that very information, and the Comptroller of the Currency on three different occasions told the public that he was furnishing it to my colleague from Michigan and myself, members of the Banking and Currency Committee, and that they could do with it as they saw fit. At the very time the Comptroller of the Currency was making public the statement that he was furnishing us that information, he wrote me a letter telling me he would furnish the information provided I would keep it confidential.

So there was a great deal of justification for the gentleman's resolution to air this whole situation; and I think the fact the gentleman did file the resolution has had a very healthy reaction on the whole situation, because it developed that in these letters which he made public at the same time he addressed the letters to us, that one lawyer for 11 months' services had received an average of $9 an hour for each legal hour spent in the discharge of his duties. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars, I think, was the total. He had asked for $165,000 but the Comptroller cut it down to $150,000. The other attorney had received $75,000 and had not put in a bill for over a year, so it could not be determined what the amount was; but based upon $150,000 for 11 months' work, for this work of this attorney certainly there was some basis for the rumor that he was to get a quarter of a million dollars, or $250,000. I want to commend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD] for starting this thing and getting the facts with respect to receivers and attorneys' fees out in the open for the benefit of the people of Michigan and particularly the people of Detroit.

Mr. McLEOD. I thank the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I want to correct one statement made by my colleague from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the effect that one attorney received $150,000. As a matter of fact, this attorney had in his employ, as the gentleman readily will admit, 11 lawyers; and the fee covered the services of 12 attorneys.

Mr. WOLCOTT. For 10 months.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. And to be perfectly fair it should be said these 11 attorneys also were occupied presumably about half of their time on the affairs of the First National Bank. Part of their time should be chargeable to that institution.

I do not want to take sides in this controversy, and I have reserved my opinion in reference to the Comptroller's allowance of these fees; but I do not want the House to suppose that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD], brought this matter to light, because, as substantiated by the hearings on the bill before us, this matter was brought to the attention of the Comptroller of the Currency by myself, and as a result of that inquiry, and before the resolution of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD] was presented, the Comptroller had agreed to make public the amounts paid to attorneys and receivers in the city of Detroit. I do not, at the present time, have sufficient judgment to determine, in my own mind, whether the amount of those fees was too great or not. That is a matter for every Member of the House to determine for himself. I do want to say, however, I am reliably informed that the amount of attorney fees in the case of the Bank of United States in New York, which was just a little larger than the Guardian Bank of Detroit, amounted to over $1,000,000. The fees for the attorneys in the City of Detroit, who worked for the receiver of the Guardian Bank, amounted to $150,000 for a period of about 10 months.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman is referring to the attorney fees in the case of the First National Bank of $150,000?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The Guardian Bank.

Mr. McLEOD. That was for 10 months only. Is the gentleman aware of that fact?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I understand, but it was for the Guardian Bank.

Mr. McLEOD. It was a bank in Detroit.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes; and I understand it was for 10 months' work.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman may be more easily satisfied than I was with the promise of the Comptroller. I introduced a resolution of disclosure to attempt to force the information that the gentleman was unable to get, and he knows it. The gentleman from Michigan admitted he was unable to get this information. So there is a diversity of opinion of two members of the committee itself. Both members apparently wanted the information. One was promised the information and eventually after the third request he was told he could have it if he kept it confidential. Does that answer the question of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SISSON. No; it does not.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I say that what my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], said with respect to the other attorneys is perfectly correct, and that is why I preceded my remarks by saying that although this amount was paid to one individual, nevertheless he was paid on the basis of $9 per hour. He had asked for $9.90 for each legal hour for all the men he had working for him. He was paid on the basis of $9 per hour for the lawyers that he had working for him. I thought I made myself clear that the $150,000 resulted in the lawyers getting paid on the basis of $9 per hour for their work. I think that is pretty good for even high-class lawyers.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield to the gentleman for a question, not for a statement or speech.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman has plenty of time. I merely wanted to reply particularly to the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I am not as familiar with the details as the gentleman is, but I was present at the committee meeting when both the gentlemen from Michigan, Mr. BROWN and Mr. WOLCOTT, asked Mr. O'Connor for this information. There was never any equivocation about it, and, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] has indicated, there was no hesitation, in giving the information. It was obviously apparent, however, that to break this matter down and give it in detail would require some time. Mr. O'Connor frankly said it was something he was perfectly willing to furnish. So far as the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT], that some lawyer was going to get $9 an hour or $9.90 an hour is concerned, I am sure that the gentleman from Michigan is a good enough lawyer that he has been very frequently able to command at least $9.90 an hour. I am only a garden variety of lawyer myself, but sometimes I have received $100 a day. It depends upon the importance of the work, and the gentleman's statement should include in the amount involved the results accomplished and the fact that several of these firms of attorneys were employed by former Comptrollers under Republican administrations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The gentleman is correct. The Comptroller of the Currency told me, in response to questions, that he would be very glad to furnish me the information as a Member of Congress. He first asked us to keep it confidential; then he said if we felt our duty as a Member of Congress demanded it, we could make the information public. I have said that on three occasions the Comptroller of the Currency publicly said we would be at liberty to use this information as we saw fit. After the statement before the committee and after the statement which he had given to the Detroit papers with respect to making it public, I had a letter from him, which I have in my files, and I will bring it over and put in the RECORD if necessary, in which he asked me to keep this in confidence. After he had made these public statements that he would be glad to have us receive the information and give it to the public, he still asked me to keep it in confidence and still kept us in the position of not being able to advise our constituents or the people interested about the matter without breaking faith with the Comptroller. I want to make my situation very clear so far as Mr. O'Connor is concerned. I admire the gentleman and I think he is doing a splendid job. It might seem inconsistent for me to say that in view of what has gone on, but I have written him to that effect. I have no fight with Mr. O'Connor. I merely want to bring out the fact that the regulations have been such that he perhaps has not been able to give out this information.

If the regulation and the laws are such that he cannot give out the information, then by examination before our committee we should determine it so that in the future there will be no misunderstanding as to why the Comptroller of the Currency does not give out to the public information concerning attorneys' fees on pending receiverships.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SISSON. I agree 100 percent with my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT]. He has made a very fair statement about the matter, which goes a long way toward clearing the matter up. I was merely addressing my first question, as I think the RECORD will disclose, to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD] not by reason of the fact he introduced a resolution, if he felt compelled to do that, but as now appears because there was already a request by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] for the information which he had requested and the gentleman from Michigan, before he made any other move in the matter, gave out statement after statement to the newspapers of his charges.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman should be willing to prove any kind of statement he would make on the floor of this House. Now what possesses the gentleman at this time to make a statement that there is absolutely no truth in? What is possessing him to do that at this time? Is it Mr. O'Connor?

Mr. SISSON. No; Mr. O'Connor would not possess me to make any statement.

Mr. McLEOD. Can the gentleman answer what it is that made him say that? There was but one statement put out previous to the time I introduced this resolution and that statement was merely an announcement that I intended introducing the resolution on a certain succeeding day.

Mr. SISSON. I do not know when the gentleman introduced the resolution.

Mr. McLEOD. Then how does the gentleman know what he is talking about?

Mr. SISSON. But the resolution was introduced after the information was asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], and before the gentleman made any request.

Mr. McLEOD. First, you say you do not know when the resolution was introduced.

Mr. SISSON. And then the gentleman made a statement to the newspapers.

Mr. McLEOD. But the gentleman does not know when the newspaper statements were made.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman knows that. Why does he not come forth with the information?

Mr. McLEOD. Why does not the gentleman more fully inform himself before he makes such a statement?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to ask that the debate proceed in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. McLEOD. After this discussion concerning the Comptroller, which I had no intention of referring to whatsoever, I must say at this time, since it has been discussed here, that after the information that has been referred to by both the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT]——

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the debate proceed in order.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman at least wants to be fair.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I think I am fair.

Mr. McLEOD. I am proceeding in order.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. In my opinion, the gentleman has not been proceeding in order since he started.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maryland that this collateral matter was injected into the gentleman's speech, and the Chair feels the gentleman has reasonable latitude with respect to the information he has referred to.

Mr. McLEOD. It is pitiable that there is a movement afoot to defend the action of a bureaucrat of this administration, who, on the request of the two Members I have referred to, should have furnished the information desired. Perhaps it would have been more in order for a member of the Banking and Currency Committee to have offered the resolution of disclosure requesting this information rather than myself, but I did it, and I have no apologies to make, the result being that the unfavorable report of the committee contained the statement that Mr. O'Connor, in his next report, would supply the information requested. Is not that the fact, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN]?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes; I do not remember exactly what the committee reported, but I do want the RECORD to show that at the time the matter was first raised, on March 27, I believe, Mr. O'Connor, in answer to my question, did say, "I will give you that information", referring to the attorneys' fees, "and it is then up to you." He meant as to publication.

Mr. McLEOD. And it was then stated in the adverse report of the committee on my resolution that it would be forthcoming in the next report. Is not that the fact?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes; that is right.

Mr. McLEOD. To proceed, then, Mr. O'Connor happens to be the type that takes offense at the slightest suggestion that the policies of his office are subject to improvement. He has been antagonistic ever since the introduction of my bank depositors' pay-off bill in the last Congress, when fully one-third of the Membership of the House during the last session, by signing the discharge petition on this measure, indicated their dissatisfaction with the system of liquidating closed banks which Mr. O'Connor seeks to perpetuate. Everything I have said is a matter of record and can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Mr. O'Connor's statement was inserted in the RECORD by Senator BYRNES, of South Carolina, at the request of Mr. O'Connor. Senator BYRNES, a Democrat, was unprejudiced and fair enough also to insert my reply to Mr. O'Connor's statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There is no need of further discussion of the matter. It is just one of those things that were offensive to Mr. O'Connor because he was urged to a course of action by my colleagues, Representatives WOLCOTT and BROWN, as well as by myself, which was not in keeping with his reticent attitude regarding the information sought.

I have already consumed more time than I had expected to use and, in conclusion, let me return to the theme of my remarks and stress the fact that the present receivership system was designed to meet the needs and requirements of a bygone age. It was formed to liquidate assets which did not have the prospect of enhancement and appreciation through the recovery of values crushed by a world-wide economic upheaval. It has served its purpose and should make way for a successor modeled to meet the exigencies of the present situation and to meet the different liquidating requirements of today.

The R. F. C. has proved one of the most efficient weapons in our fight for recovery. It can and will, if we will provide the ammunition contained in the bill, to which I referred, do more than any other single agency of the Government in blasting the obstacles which are today impeding and blocking our efforts to win economic rehabilitation.

My conception of this whole picture is that when this vital question is disposed of, finally and conclusively, and when there will no longer be receivership banks undergoing wasteful liquidation in practically every city in the country, then, and not until then, will we see the break in the clouds which will presage complete recovery.

Then, and not until then, can we expect the people to place their savings confidently in the ordinary and customary channels of private enterprise which form the arteries of out national life. The resumption of the employment-creating functions of private business which this would foster and engender would, to my mind, be the real turning point in our struggle for recovery. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN].

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the Committee, to my mind the bill under consideration has much merit. As a member of the Banking Committee, I voted in the committee for many amendments to the original draft. I should like to go along with my committee on the bill presented to the House, but I believe that further changes are needed to effect the results which sponsors of this legislation feel it will accomplish.

I am prepared as a committee member to vote for amendments that I expect will be introduced in an effort to make the banking bill of 1935 a better bill, more far-reaching, and which will do what the country expects of the Congress in its banking legislation.

I had hoped in committee that another title might be added—a title concerning a matter which I am about to discuss, that, to my mind at least, would have made for greater satisfaction with the banking bill of 1935.

There is now before the House Committee on Banking and Currency a measure introduced by me some weeks ago, and which I hope will be presented to this honorable body within the near future. This bill proposes to set up an intermediate credit corporation for business and industry. It has for its purpose the enactment of a law which will provide machinery designed to give immediate credit relief to the small business and commercial enterprises of this country. Big business can take care of itself. Government functions have been developed which provide assistance to various agricultural enterprises and to institutions of a financial character.

The credit plight of America's small business and industrial concerns is well known to every one of us. For years these small concerns, numbering many thousands and which form the real backbone of our commercial system, have been suffering an economic strangulation largely uncalled for in view of the fact that there exist means in this country to provide for them the assistance which will enable them to revive, carry on, and contribute their share to the return of recovery.

During the last session of Congress there was enacted a law giving power to the Federal Reserve System and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan directly to these small concerns. To what extent has this law, which has been in operation for 10 months, given the help for which the small business men and industrialists have been pleading, and the lack of which has been holding them back, forcing them into an unwilling bankruptcy?

The last Congress voted $580,000,000 for this purpose. As of April 27, 1935, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the direct loans to industry law has actually disbursed but $14,872,667. The Federal Reserve System as of April 24, 1935, has actually loaned out but $29,055,000. In other words a bare 7 percent, which is no help at all.

When Congress passed this law on the closing days of the last session the act was hailed as one of the most constructive and beneficial pieces of legislation to come out of the Roosevelt administration. You know as well as I the need of the law. You know as well as I the tremendous difficulty of small concerns to secure a loan from banks.

Why have the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal Reserve System fallen down on their jobs? It is not their fault. They are governed by the attitude of bankers. Requirements imposed upon applicants for loans are so strict, collateral demands are so stringent that would-be borrowers are discouraged from even attempting to secure loans.

The corporation which is proposed under my bill would be governed by the humane attitude which is governing the program and the policy of this administration. Of course, there would be requirements. Every business man wants them, and wants to meet them, but there would be brought to this organization a sympathetic understanding for the needs of business and industry. Consideration would be given to the personal attributes of an applicant and the corporation would be directed with a policy which has long vision.

When one views the enormity of the problem and the seriousness of the situation, it is heart-breaking to realize that Congress in its far-seeing wisdom passed this act, confident that small commercial enterprise in America would be stimulated and revived, and that today there is still unused more than 93 percent of the money which was set aside for this purpose.

How long is this going to continue? How long are we Members of Congress going to receive these piteous appeals from the small business men and industrialists of our communities, begging and imploring for aid so that they themselves will not be wiped out and the few employees to which they have been able to hold on will not be thrown onto the relief rolls?

We are deeply concerned here with the problem of unemployment. We are deeply concerned with the problem of relief. Let met quote from a few of the letters which have come to me from all parts of the country. There is only one point I am going to bring out today and that is the contribution to permanent employment which will be given to this country by the passage of this bill.

From my own city of Hartford, Conn., a concern writes me:

> There are any number of concerns in our section, who could, with a little help from the Government, increase their business and reemploy hundreds of people, and until the time arrives when the Government will come to the assistance of small business, it is useless to talk about recovery.

Again from Hartford I received the following comment on my bill:

> If such a bill was passed, there is no question but that it would become a major factor in creating new jobs and would be conducive to reducing the number of unemployed, and consequently reduce the need for relief.

From Hammond, Ind., a concern, whose application had been turned down by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, wrote to that department as follows:

> In anticipation of our increasing trade and hopes of augmenting our working capital, we had already added two people to our pay roll. This in the office force. When your letter of rejection came, we found it necessary to lay off one of the office employees in order to conserve our finances, but if this loan was granted, we would not only recall the one person in the office but we would double our present force of men in the factory. We are confronted with these difficulties because of a lack of work capital.

An awning- and tent-manufacturing association in New England wrote me that, as a result of the inability of member concerns to obtain credit assistance—

> Many of our New England awning and tent manufacturers who were unable to borrow from their banks discharged their employees, after the awning season was over, around the Fourth of July, rather than carry them over all the year, as it was possible to do when they could borrow money or business was good. I predict for this industry that if bank or Government money cannot be had by borrowers in this industry that a large number of our manufacturers will discharge more workers than last year, and thus more idleness in this business until the following season opens.

From Detroit, Mich., I received a letter from a petroleum association from which I quote:

> If credit can be arranged for small- and medium-size businesses of the country, it would do more to put men to work and improve business than any action which has been taken so far by the Government.

From a heart-breaking plea for Federal credit assistance which I received from a concern in St. Louis, Mo., I quote the following paragraph:

Ten short years ago we employed about 35 persons with an annual payroll in excess of $75,000. Today we have no regular employees and our stock and equipment is sadly depleted.

A business man in New York writes me:

I feel rather certain that if I were to be called before your committee that I could convince beyond a shadow of a doubt that millions of people are still unemployed at present and will continue to be unemployed as a result of the inability of the smaller merchant to secure financial aid and assistance.

Again from New York City I quote the following letter:

We are among the small enterprises suffering from lack of sufficient capital to do business as we should. We employ about 80 men at present, but if we had more capital we could employ about 40 or 50 more.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Of course, the gentleman realizes that the average commercial bank cannot provide long-time working capital for industry, large or small.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I do.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. It must come from some other type of financial agency.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I wonder if the gentleman has considered the use of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in this connection?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I am glad to say to the gentleman that the results achieved during the past 10 months, in the practical experience of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, have proved to me and to the rest of the country that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has not been successful in handling intermediate loans. The Corporation has failed to fulfill the expectations we anticipated from the passage of this law. There is no hope for business and industry with respect to intermediate loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Does the gentleman think that the trouble is in the personnel at the head of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or does he think that it is due to some limitation in the law?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. It is in part due to the banking attitude of both the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal Reserve System, which hampers them in making loans known as intermediate, long-term loans. They are not set up for that purpose, and if they were they could not get away from the attitude of our bankers throughout the country, who have refused to make this type of loan to industry and business.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I may say to the gentleman that I agree with him, that there is a need for the kind of credit about which he is talking, and many of the officials of the administration, I know, feel the same way, but the difficulty is to find the organization that is best suited to handle it. It has seemed to me that if we could amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law to that end, the gentleman's object could be best attained in that way.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. So it seemed to all of us in the last session of Congress when we passed this law, setting aside $580,000,000 to these two organizations, the R. F. C. and the Federal Reserve System. But they have proved to everyone that they are not the organizations for that purpose. My bill, even scanned through, will demonstrate, I am certain, to the gentleman and to the Congress, that the set-up requires men who are removed from the bankers' attitude, men who understand credits, who are sympathetic to the needs of business, and whose idea is to bring back recovery through aiding small industrials to go ahead with orders in hand, and employ men to carry out the orders in hand, by giving them adequate credit and working capital.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Yes.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. It may interest the gentleman to know that a committee in New York had before it some 53 applications for industrial loans 9 or 10 days ago. After the committee got through its work it granted exactly three loans. This was told me by a Member, who was a member of the committee, who says that he will no longer attend the sessions because they get nowhere, and he admitted that many of the loans that were turned down ought to have been granted.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I thank the gentleman and I call that statement to the attention of my colleague from Michigan [Mr. BROWN].

Temporary-made work is not going to solve our unemployment problem, nor is the generosity of a benevolent Government toward its distressed and needy going to be the cure-all through measures of relief. Relief is necessary, but it should merely be a gap, not a permanent thing. This bill offers a method toward a durable recovery. If some of the money which was allocated for relief were turned over to the credit assistance of business and industrial concerns, each of which in its small way can add to its pay rolls anywhere from 5 to 100 people in a given community, then we would be on the path to recovery. Take 100 families off these relief projects and put them back into the private industries of our land in a given community and one of the most important jobs of this Congress will have been effected. Repeat that situation in thousands of communities all over the country and you will find that the total expenditure will be infinitesimal and the results more permanent. Do not forget that these are merely loans and that the money will be paid back.

This Government has had enough experience with individuals and organizations receiving loans to have every confidence in the ability and the willingness of the recipient to repay these loans. The American people do not want charity.

My measure is in line with the reconstructive program of this administration. The job that is before us is far more important than the job which we undertook 2 years ago, for today we must cement solidly together the bricks of this new-deal edifice and build a permanent structure as the basis of a revitalized American system. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BUCKLER].

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it gives me quite a little pleasure to appear before you here this afternoon, but I think I would have been better satisfied if we had had a little larger audience. There are quite a number who do not seem to be here this afternoon, and I am pretty sure that what I may say will not have very much effect and will probably be like pouring water on a duck's back to drown it.

When this banking question is raised I feel it is my duty to say a few words concerning the banking system, because the farmers have suffered untold losses and misery through the banking arrangements under the Federal Reserve System. Being a farmer myself, perhaps I do not have as much knowledge of the present bill as some others. For a long time I thought perhaps I was the only farmer in Congress, but I have found three or four in the last few weeks besides myself. When I was a young man, and for quite a while after, I thought a Congressman was some super individual, created with all the knowledge almost in the universe; but when I found out that previous Congresses had turned over the control of the money and credit of this Nation to a bunch of individual bankers I changed my mind. I do not know what this Congress intends to do about it.

I expect to support this bill now before us, but I say at the outset that it is not exactly to my liking, because I think the Government should take over the Federal Reserve Banking System and control the money and credit of this Nation instead of leaving it in the hands of the present Federal Reserve System.

This bill perhaps goes part way, but you will never have a real money system until you take the money and credits out of the hands of the Wall Street bankers and put it into the Government where it belongs, so that it can be administered for all the people and not for just a few as it has been in the past.

There is no doubt that when President Wilson directed the passage of the Federal Reserve Act, it was done with the intention of benefiting the people. I think the President was honest and sincere; but it has been changed at different times, and it has got into the hands of the big bankers until they control it for their own interests instead of in the interests of the people.

I might say the Federal Reserve banks, as you all know, are owned and controlled by the big bankers of this Nation. The small bankers do not have very much interest in the Federal Reserve System. When the Federal Reserve Board in 1920 broke the farmers, they broke the country bankers of this Nation as well. During the war they inflated the currency. In some instances they issued currency. The country bankers and the big bankers inflated the currency by giving some fellow a check book and loaning him a few thousand dollars. We have been talking about fiat money. We hear a great deal of that when it comes from the big bankers of this Nation. I would like to know what is more fiat than a check book with a credit of $1,000 and only $100 back of it.

Up in my country we paid 10-percent interest up until 1923 when the State legislature passed my bill which reduced it to 8 percent. It was an inducement to the bankers to loan the money when they could get 10-percent interest. Most of it was credit that belonged to the people. So I say the time will come, Mr. Chairman, when a man who runs a bank in this Nation will have to have money instead of credit. Why is it necessary to issue bonds and pay some big bankers interest on the bonds and then print money and hand it over to the bankers and let them loan it to the farmer when the Government itself could print and issue the money direct and save the interest charges on the bonds. If the bonds are good then the currency is good. You are not going to pass legislation of that kind in this session, but it is coming. Perhaps I would not have been down here if it had not been for something like this legislation which the people are demanding. Perhaps they will send more progressive men down here because they are going to have legislation for the benefit of the people.

In 1920, after they inflated the currency to win the war, it was all right, but what did they do in the fall of 1920 when this same Federal Reserve bank took the money out of circulation, pulled it out of the agricultural districts, and purposely broke the farmers of this Nation. Our wheat was worth $2 a bushel and in 6 months it went down to $1 a bushel, and in a few years it went down to 30 or 40 cents a bushel. They not only broke the farmers, but they broke the small bankers of this Nation. What do these Federal Reserve banks and big banks in Wall Street care about the small banks throughout the country? No more than they cared for the farmer in 1920. They did it because they want the chain system. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK], told you about the chain system that started in Minneapolis and went through the Northwest. That is what they wanted. They are the ones who caused the panic in 1920. They broke the farmer. About 2,000,000 farmers have lost their farms since this thing was pulled off. Millions have lost their homes, many of them are old people. I know old people who had worked all their lives and thought they had laid up something for a rainy day. Today where are they? Thrown out of their homes; no place to go; nothing to look forward to except the poorhouse and the grave.

Now, do you want a system like that? If you do, go on with the old Federal Reserve System which you have got now. You will have a panic every few years. They get people to go ahead and build homes, and then they take them away from them like they have been doing for generations. That is the system we have been working under. People have been doing business on credit. These debts cost perhaps a billion dollars interest a year, and for the benefit of whom? Just a few racketeers down there on Wall Street. Talk about pirates! Those pirates in Wall Street are worse than any pirate who ever roamed the seas. [Applause.]

So I say we have to take the control of money out of the hands of the Shylocks and get it back in the hands of the Government.

Talk about loaning money to industry! The gentleman who just preceded me made a very good speech, but it will not help to loan money to industry or anybody else until you get the farmers on their feet, because you cannot get out of this condition you are in unless you do help agriculture. I voted for the $5,000,000,000 and I will vote for $5,000,000,000 more when people are hungry, but when you spend that, and if you have not gotten the farmers back on their feet, you will be right where you were before.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I yield; yes.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Of course, the gentleman knows we all sympathize with the farmers, but will the gentleman give a clear picture of the industrial East, where hundreds of thousands of men are walking the streets, looking for work, and cannot get it and are living on relief. Would it not be well if industry could get loans and let those people go to work, and then your farmers can sell their products at good prices?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I say the gentleman made a good speech and agree with him and sympathize with the laboring people, but we should start with the farmer. When you start with the farmer and give him a price for his produce then he will buy what you manufacture. You cannot sell it unless the farmer gets so he can buy.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am with the gentleman in every word he says, I understand his language; but in my judgment the main trouble with the farmers of this country is that they are not organized. In my district labor is organized, the veterans are organized, the Townsend people are organized, other groups are organized, but the farmers are not organized. Oh, they have two or three organizations, but they do not represent anything, they do not get any cooperation or concerted action whatever. The consequence is that the majority of the farmers of the West for the last 60 years have been voting for the political party that invented and fastened this monetary system on them and which keeps it on them.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I think there is a great deal of truth in what the gentleman says. I shall tell you a story which I think will illustrate the gentleman's point and his complaint of lack of organization on the part of the farmers. The story has to do with a couple of farmers, and if ever there were slaves it is the farmer and the farmer's wife; but these two farmers had managed to get away a day for a picnic and they went to a lake for a little recreation. They got a boat and went out on the water. Their names were Mike and Ole. The boat tipped over and Ole fell out and into the water. Ole went down and when he came up, Mike grabbed him by the hair; it was a wig and it came off. Mike threw it into the boat. Ole went down and came up the second time and Mike grabbed him by the arm, that was wooden and it came off. Mike threw it into the boat. Ole went down and came up for the third time. Make then grabbed one of Ole's legs and this was wooden, too, and it came off and Mike threw it into the boat. Ole went down and came up again hollering "help! help!" and Mike said, "How the hell can I help you if you don't stick together?" [Laughter.] So, how can we help the farmer if they do not stick together? [Applause.]

Ever since the days of William Jennings Bryan I have been trying to get the farmers in my country to organize and have been arguing for 16 to 1. Those were fighting days; if you said anything against Bryan, you just got knocked over, that is all. I have been fighting ever since to get the farmers to organize and get some benefits for themselves. I have heard talk about the monetary system since the days of Bryan and I probably heard something about it before, but not very much. [Laughter.] Anyhow, this system has been operating for years. I shall tell you another incident; it is true. I tell it to illustrate the plight of the laboring man and the farmer who have produced the wealth of this Nation but who have been robbed by this system. I was standing on a street corner in Minneapolis—not my city,

I am a farmer, I live out in the country where we get plenty of air, but that is all we do get [laughter]—standing on a street corner. This story could be duplicated in any city in the country. Standing on the street corner in Minneapolis one day I saw a laboring man come along. He had his family with him, his wife and little children, half fed and half clothed. Standing on the same street corner I saw a farmer come along with a little old Ford, an old tin Lizzie, his family half clothed. Standing on the same street corner I saw a limousine, owned by a man who belonged to the class that have been robbing us farmers and the laboring men all these years. A Negro coachman sat by the chauffeur in front. On the back seat was a lady and beside her a little poodle dog. [Laughter.]

This poodle dog was given more care than is given to the families of the laboring people and the farmers of this Nation. The difference in the welfare of these people comes about by reason of the monetary system we have been tolerating all these years. Maybe it would not be so bad to have a poodle dog riding in the back seat except for the fact that you can go out to the graveyard—perhaps you have got them in New York—where the poodle dog is buried, you will see a stone that stands 3 feet high, while over in any city graveyard you can see acres and acres where the laboring people lie beneath the sod with little stones 12 or 14 inches high—acres and acres of them—poor people who have been robbed by this monetary system. And you can go to the country and find lonely graveyards where some of the farmers have buried their families with nothing to mark the grave except a wooden slab.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman stated that the laboring man is interested in this legislation. He may be involved in it but I question whether he is interested in it. One of the troubles with organized labor is that they are not interested in this kind of legislation. They do not give a snap about any banking system or monetary system; they are chiefly interested in hours, wages, working conditions, and things like that.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. They have to live, however. I appreciate the force of what the gentleman has said, but there are differences of opinion on the subject. Perhaps they are not interested in the money question but they should be.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have been a member of organized labor for 45 years, so I am speaking with knowledge of them as well as of the farmer. That is one thing they are not interested in nearly as much as they should be.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Of course, that is true.

Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio. How far is Minneapolis from St. Paul?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. They adjoin; the city limits come together so they are practically one city. I do not know whether St. Paul has a graveyard where they bury poodles or not; they probably take them over to Minneapolis. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. THOM. How do the lawyers get along out in Minnesota?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Most of them are starved out. They finally have come around. They used to fight us farmers but they have come around now and are quite decent. You know the quickest way to a man's heart is through his stomach or his pocketbook and they both have been empty, so the lawyers are not so bad.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. They are always pretty glad when they can close out the farmers and sell their property.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Yes. Of course, you cannot blame them for that. They are broke, too, and if they get a chance to make a few hundred dollars they will close out a farmer and take away his property.

Mr. Chairman, we have a serious situation in this country at the present time. There is no question about that. Since I have been down here I have become rather disgusted. You know, my people sent me down here with the statement: "Go down there and please do something for us quick." When I started down here I thought everybody would be in the same frame of mind as I was, but I found that this was not the case. [Laughter.] I used to draw a little water in the State Senate and was successful in passing a few bills, but the only thing I have been able to draw here is a little hell from the gentleman from Arkansas. [Laughter.] You know, there is an old saying that one would rather be a big toad in a small puddle than a small toad in a big puddle.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the Federal Reserve Board some time back broke the farmers, but there was another class of men that they had not got to yet. So in 1929 they deflated the currency and trimmed up all of these lawyers and business men as well. They broke them, too. At that time they took about $20,000,000,000 out of their pockets and now the money crowd has it all. You may have a little change left, but that is all. It is kind of good to come down here to Congress, where you draw a salary. Sometimes I think we should be ashamed to take it for what little we are doing down here. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, we have to take this country out of the hands of the money changers. I think if you would take a bunch of schoolboys and let them read up a bit they would do better than we are doing down here in Congress. I am going to support this bill, although it does not go as far as I should like it to go. There has been some mention of putting an amendment on this bill to put the small State banks under the act. I ask you to leave the small State banks out for a while until we see how this Board goes. We know what this old Board did to those banks that were under it some time back.

Let us see how this is going to work out. If this Board is going to be no better than the one we had before, perhaps the State banks will not want to come under the System.

Mr. Chairman, this bill could be made a lot better if such amendments were adopted as will be offered, I understand, by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS]. Those gentlemen know how to do it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] made the best speech yesterday that I ever heard. He told the Members the truth about this situation. Are you going to listen?

A Member spoke yesterday about Liberty bonds and mentioned the fact in his address that he had to sell his Liberty bonds for $80 on the $100. I told you of two instances where the people have been robbed, and here is another one. The same crowd did that. They bought your Liberty bonds. You had to buy them and then those fellows pulled off a panic and bought your Liberty bonds for $80 on the $100 and made millions and millions of dollars out of the transactions.

That crowd has all the money, so that there is not enough left to quarrel about. There are more debts today than the property would bring if it were sold. There are something like two hundred and fifty or two hundred and seventy-five billion dollars of debts, and there is only about $200,000,000,000 to be realized if the property was sold for what it was worth a few years ago. If you sold it now you would not get half this amount. I have a farm that was worth about $100 an acre and today you could not sell it for $25 an acre. These farmers had farms worth $100 or $125 an acre with a mortgage of $25 or $30 an acre on the farm. This money crowd ran the value down to the amount of the mortgage, then they took the farm. What about the $50 or $75 an acre that the farmer had in it? How about these farmers' wives who get up at 5 o'clock in the morning and work all day long until 9, 10, or 11 o'clock at night, trying to keep their family half clothed and half fed? Talk about freeing the Negroes back in the Civil War days! Why do not you get busy and free these farmers and their wives? There are enough of us here to do something if we would only work. I say if there is any slavery in the United States today it is the farmers' wives. [Applause.]

I wish I had some of the Members out on my farm. I think about 30 days would cure you. There are about 150 signers on the petition to bring up the Frazier-Lemke bill. That does the same thing for the farmers that you are doing for Wall Street; yet there are only about 150 signers out of a Membership of 435. If I could get you out on my farm, getting up at 5 o'clock and doing all the chores, it would be different. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, as I started to say, if I had these Members out on my farm or some other farm, the situation would be different. They would get up at 5 o'clock in the morning, go out and feed and tend the horses and milk 8 or 10 cows. Then they would eat a little bit of breakfast, go out to the field, stay until 12, come back and eat a bite, and then go out about 1 o'clock and stay until 6. Then tend the horses, feed the cows, and what not, then get a little bit to eat and go out about 9 o'clock and milk 10 cows and get the milk separated. And then, in addition to all this, you would go out and probably find a new-born calf. [Laughter.] You would put it in a pen, get a pail of milk in one hand and the calf's nose in the other and try to feed it while 5 or 6 other calves were stepping on your toes and sucking your coat. [Laughter.] I believe about 30 days of that kind of life would be sufficient, and you would be signing the petition for the Frazier-Lemke bill.

If that is not enough, you might feed these calves a couple of years, take them to town, get yourself all tired out and wet with sweat handling them, and then sell them and get $10 to $15 per head. Hungry, you then go down to a restaurant with an appetite and see the people sitting there eating porterhouse steak while you have to crawl up on a stool and ask for liver. [Laughter.] That would undoubtedly fix you and you would be up here signing this petition by that time. Why do not you come up here and sign this petition for the Lemke bill and let the farmers have this cheap money instead of turning it over to Wall Street?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman has asked a very vital, pertinent question. Last year we secured 145 signers to the Lemke petition, but we were not given an opportunity to vote on that bill. There are some Members of Congress who do not want you to vote on that bill because it will do as you say—it will do for the farmers what we have already done for the Wall Street bankers and the banking crooks of the country.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Yes; I thank the gentleman. That is true and I would like to ask the members of the committee who have this bill to send it out here and let us Members vote on it. The people back home want you to vote on it. If you want to vote against it, all right, but bring it out here and let us have a vote on it. My people are writing me every day about it.

Some people here have said a great deal about the processing tax. The processing tax was not my way of doing it to start with, but we have got the processing tax. My friends over on the other side here are good fellows. I sit over there with them. Of course, I am in a kind of Cherokee Strip and I do not know which side I belong on. I am a Farmer-Laborite myself.

Now, they want to take off the processing tax. I remember 2 years ago when we farmers were selling wheat in my neighborhood for 30 cents a bushel, hogs for 1 cent or one cent and a half, and the railroads would make you pay a little extra money for the freight if you shipped a cow to market, the cow wouldn't even bring enough to pay the freight.

I never heard them then say anything about the poor farmer, when he was giving his stuff away, selling it far below cost. The processing tax is increasing the amount the farmer receives and you people in the East cannot live unless we live and get started and are able to buy your manufactured goods. It was not my way of doing it, but we have got it and let us stick to it now that we have it until we get something better.

However, what this Congress could do is this. This Congress could take off the processing tax and give us a minimum price which should be cost of production plus a small profit for what is consumed in the United States and there are bills here to that effect. This would cure all this hollering about the processing tax. Give us a minimum price, cost of production, and I have no objection to your regulating the acreage, if you want to.

Then there is another bunch of fellows, besides the big bankers, who are keeping the farmers down and they are this chamber-of-commerce and board-of-trade bunch of buzzards that have picked the farmers. [Applause.] They pick him even before he has his grain cut.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I just want to ask the gentleman if the Blue Eagle belongs in the same class of buzzards to which he is referring?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I do not know whether it would be hard to tell a Blue Eagle from a buzzard or not. Some people do not like the Blue Eagle. I do not know whether I like him or not. I have not had much acquaintance with him, but I have had some acquaintance with these buzzards I spoke about, because before you can get your grain cut these fellows will sell your crop and they will not only sell your crop but they will sell 10 times what you have raised. A bear can outdo a bull any time when he has the money back of him.

All they sell is wind, and the bull has got to pay for the grain. So I say there is another thing we can do. Why not put these fellows out of business? We farmers have kept these fellows long enough and they are of no use to us. Put them on the soup lines as they have put a lot of farmers on the soup lines.

Now, I have taken up a lot of your time. I could go on here for hours if I attempted to tell you all the farmer's troubles, but I want to thank you for your patience, and I hope you will get busy and do something for the farmers. If you do not do something, you may not come back, because they sent you down here to do something for them. [Laughter and applause.]

I thank you.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to take the present opportunity of discussing the history, aims, and accomplishments of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation which has suggested some of the proposed amendments that we are now considering. I shall be brief and to the point.

It will be recalled that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation was created by the Banking Act of 1933, which was signed by President Roosevelt on June 16 of that year. Even those who were not Members of this House at that time will recall that something had to be done to revive the prostrate banking system after its collapse in February of 1933, when it ceased completely to function as a result of the banking holiday proclaimed by President Roosevelt on March 6th. I shall not dwell upon the condition of the country and the state of mind of our people in that dark hour. I think it is sufficient for my present purposes merely to say that catastrophe and ruin were averted by the President's historic reassurance to the country in his now-famous and celebrated fireside broadcast, and by the brilliant and timely conception and introduction of the legislation providing for the Federal insurance of bank deposits.

To my mind the administration and the country have every reason to be proud and thankful that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has been so successful in accomplishing its primary objects of restoring the confidence of the people in banks and of rebuilding the entire banking structure. Here is an agency which has done its job without fanfare or the blowing of trumpets. It has dispelled the fear that gripped the Nation's depositors. It has helped to strengthen and remake a banking system that had crumpled and failed. It has won the respect of bankers in rural communities and business centers as well. In a word, it has done a gigantic task in a superb manner. Its efficacy as an agency of recovery is well attested by the regular reports received in Washington from State directors of the National Emergency Council. These reports represent an unbiased cross-section of public opinion in the States. A summary of those submitted for the month of March reveals that in no State has an unfavorable reaction to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation been noticed. Thirty-five State directors report definitely favorable reactions, many of them saying that the corporation is generally considered the most universally beneficial of the recovery measures.

I should like at this point to extend my remarks in the RECORD by reading in the text of the reports to which I have just referred.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SUMMARY OF PUBLIC OPINION CONCERNING FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

ALABAMA

Never any criticism of this activity. Stands highest in public opinion of all emergency measures; has restored confidence in banks and resulted in greatly increased deposits.

ARIZONA

Apparently public very favorable to F. D. I. C. This agency has restored confidence in all banks and undoubtedly exerted considerable influence in abolishing hoarding on the part of the people who had previously felt that banks were unsafe and that they should keep their money in cash at home. Every bank in this State except one is a member. Information at hand indicates that the citizens of the district where this bank is located are very dissatisfied and are not depositing their funds in this bank due to the fact that it does not have deposit insurance. Considerable interest expressed by public in the announcement that deposits in building-and-loan associations might be insured. General summary would be that the public is very much interested in continuation of deposit insurance and that it is a very determining factor in restoring and maintaining confidence in the banking institutions.

ARKANSAS

Representative bankers advise that public reaction to F. D. I. C. is 100 percent favorable. Great majority of bankers also favorable, but believe present limit might wisely be reduced to $2,500. Two bankers state they are strongly opposed to plan in principle. None interviewed has ever heard criticism of insured deposits by customers.

CALIFORNIA

Public opinion strongly back of Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, despite objections of some larger banks to pay premiums.

COLORADO

Public opinion here practically unanimous in favor of F. D. I. C.

CONNECTICUT

Public seems entirely indifferent to present Federal deposit insurance law. Some 12 or 13 banks in Connecticut have not subscribed to plan and their deposits have not been affected. Some depositors inquired of their banks about this insurance when it became effective, but none has mentioned it to the Hartford banks in months. There is no demand here for increasing amount of insurance above five thousand, as 95 percent of all accounts are fully protected under present law. No Connecticut savings banks subscribed to plan because of adverse opinion of State attorney general. I can find no objection by saving-bank depositors. State director personally feels that the present $5,000 limit is sufficient in Connecticut. This State has been particularly fortunate in having very few bank failures.

DELAWARE

Due to the fact that no bank failures occurred in Delaware, the public has shown little interest in F. D. I. C. Contacts made are all favorable.

FLORIDA

Have contacted 20 various business houses. Everyone heartily endorses the F. D. I. C. Believe this sentiment universal in Florida.

GEORGIA

F. D. I. C. was welcomed by great mass of people. Has been important factor in restoring confidence in banks, particularly smaller institutions. Regarded by many as one of most constructive steps in present national administration. Increased savings deposits in many banks believed traceable to insurance plan. While activities not subject to general discussion now, individuals and business, especially smaller business, finding satisfaction in safety provided by its operation.

IDAHO

Deposit insurance remains the cornerstone of public confidence in banks. Bankers admit F. D. I. C. has produced solid public confidence in banks. Public opinion overwhelmingly favorable and confidence in banks remains solid with deposits increasing.

ILLINOIS

Report not received up to April 12, 1935.

INDIANA

Has restored confidence in banks.

IOWA

Public reaction to F. D. I. C. definitely favorable. Small depositor, which includes savings depositor, is very favorable to insurance of deposits. Best evidence of this is literally hundreds of cases reported to us of money taken from Postal Savings, from hoardings, and from larger banks in border States and deposited in Iowa banks after inception of F. D. I. C. There is some disposition to the belief that insurance is so satisfactory to the depositor that he does not seek other investments. It tends to restore confidence in the bank and thereby stabilize banking conditions and satisfies small depositor, who as a rule is the cause of runs on banks. Public is grateful and happy for benefits of F. D. I. C.

KANSAS

Banks now beginning to fully appreciate the value of this activity, with the result that an increasing number are subscribing. It has greatly increased confidence in financial institutions. However, many banks still remain without insurance.

KENTUCKY

Much appreciated by public generally. Resulted in growing increase of deposits in all banks. Smaller banks quite enthusiastic. Some larger institutions feel their independence, objecting to expense of operations. These objections made some months ago, but little protest at present time. Unquestionable demand for retention of act.

LOUISIANA

My opinion public reaction Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation present act should be made permanent. Adds stability and confidence in banks, decentralizes and distributes deposits, and eliminates the chance of run on banks from small depositors. Some bankers indifferent and feel their institutions command confidence without insurance feature. Small banks in country generally favorable to deposit insurance.

MAINE

Public sentiment favorable to F. D. I. C. Maine commercial banks favor this. State savings banks have centrally managed liquidity fund.

MARYLAND

Activities progressing quietly.

MASSACHUSETTS

Report not received up to April 12, 1935.

MICHIGAN

From every source I get only favorable public reaction to Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Belief quite general that this agency is reestablishing faith in banks. Increased deposits in Michigan banks best proof of renewed confidence.

MINNESOTA

Agency has done outstanding work, and 95 percent of banks in this State are insured. Public well-informed and very favorable toward this activity. Agency 100 percent efficient and popular with both public and banks. Exceedingly popular and has produced great public confidence in banks.

MISSISSIPPI

Public opinion appears entirely favorable to Federal protection.

MISSOURI

Reaction of public and State banking department to F. D. I. C. is universally favorable. Deposits substantially increased. More than 500 State banks have voluntarily come under F. D. I. C. and only 40 have not. Most of these 40 are small or family banks, and expense is deterring factor. The favorable public reaction is general over entire State and also the four-State area. It is recognized as an essential part of the banking system.

MONTANA

Has greatly restored confidence and receives almost unanimous acclaim.

NEBRASKA

Agency has made a fine record in this State, with a high percentage of deposits now insured.

NEVADA

After experience of last 3 years, when banks were blowing up like firecrackers in Nevada, depositors unequivocally approve deposit-insurance plan. They are not interested in howl of big banks who may have to carry premiums for some of their weaker brethren. They feel this latter will be an incentive to insist on good banking practices and will insure national supervision and inspection.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

About 1 out of 50 know anything about it. New Hampshire Bankers' Association reports public neither informed nor interested. Reaction nil.

NEW JERSEY

There is little comment concerning this agency, but it is believed that this activity has full public support.

NEW MEXICO

Have heard of no comments, either pro or con, in New Mexico.

NEW YORK

Public reaction to F. D. I. C. not wide-spread but generally favorable. Larger banks in Manhattan protest method of assessments, claiming only insurable amounts of deposits should be taxed. Otherwise not opposed, although unenthusiastic.

NORTH CAROLINA

General public reaction most favorable. Find in contacting number of bankers, who will eventually help mold public opinion, in vast majority think $5,000 coverage sufficient and favor definite premium sufficient to cover, but to be lowered if justified later. Majority favor premium on insured deposits only. Five thousand limit covers 95 percent depositors' banks this State.

NORTH DAKOTA

Public attitude and editorial comment uniformly favorable.

OHIO

Program has been exceptionally beneficial and remains least criticized of all emergency agencies.

OKLAHOMA

Public reaction reveals this is one Government program with which general public will go all the way. No derogatory comment to F. D. I. C. was made in interviews with large number of Oklahoma business men and individual depositors. Editors and newspaper-clipping bureaus report State-wide approval of program as reflected in press. Increased deposits indicative of restored confidence. Group 4 of Oklahoma Bankers' Association in convention at Ardmore yesterday passed resolution recommending titles I and III, Congressional Banking Act of 1935, and commending work of F. D. I. C. Group 5 in Tulsa today expected to pass similar resolution, according to secretary of association. These group meetings represent approximately 450 eastern Oklahoma bankers. State banking commission reports only two failures in State banks since inception of F. D. I. C. Continuance of F. D. I. C. under competent management felt essential to continued faith in banking system.

OREGON

Has produced desirable feeling of security of average citizen in his bank account.

PENNSYLVANIA

Has functioned very successfully and restored confidence. Has greatly strengthened banking system, although many small banks, due to limited capital, criticize the provision compelling them to join the Federal Reserve System by July 1, 1937, in order to maintain their insured status.

RHODE ISLAND

Banking situation here unusually strong; therefore, except for added confidence due to F. D. I. C., difficult to determine public reaction.

SOUTH CAROLINA

Has restored confidence in banks. Comment is frequently expressed that this program is one of most important in "new deal." Public has great faith in this activity.

SOUTH DAKOTA

Comment wholly favorable, with the exception of a very few bankers who are opposed to the principle of this activity.

TENNESSEE

Has restored public confidence in banks.

TEXAS

Well-staffed and functioning effectively.

UTAH

Public unanimously for F. D. I. C., although some bankers and financial interests remain skeptical.

VERMONT

Public reaction to F. D. I. C. quiet but favorable. About half the banks use their participation in their advertising. Bank public apparently take it as an accomplished fact and rely upon it, although not particularly outspoken in their comment.

VIRGINIA

Report not received up to April 12, 1935.

WASHINGTON

Has resulted in vastly improved banking conditions and a general increase in deposits, although need is seen for means to enforce provisions of F. D. I. C.

WEST VIRGINIA

Public reaction to F. D. I. C. quite sympathetic and deposit insurance has stimulated confidence in banking institutions. Deposits have materially increased. Bankers, however, are opposed to proposed amendments to existing law now pending in Congress.

WISCONSIN

Don't hear about it. Deposits on increase. Only through restatement of fact that money is in circulation do we know about its works. Banks favorable.

WYOMING

Banks noncooperative toward this activity.

Mr. IGOE. The first meeting of the directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation was held on September 11, 1933. At that time Mr. Walter J. Cummings, of Chicago, was chairman; Mr. E. G. Bennett, of Ogden, Utah, an associate of the present Governor of the Federal Reserve, was the Republican appointee; and Mr. J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency, was the ex-officio member of the Board. The date is important because almost 8,000 banks which were not members of the Federal Reserve System had to be examined before January 1, 1934, in order for them to become entitled to the benefits of deposit insurance. On January 1, 1934, 12,617 banks with 52,750,000 insured accounts were members of the temporary Federal Deposit Insurance Fund. These banks had aggregate deposits of about $36,000,000,000, of which $15,000,000,000 were insurable under the provisions of the law. Of the total 12,617 banks, 6,754 were State banks not members of the Federal Reserve, 802 were State bank members, and 5,061 were national banks. No wonder President Roosevelt could thank Mr. Cummings upon his retirement in the early part of 1934 "for a big job well done."

When the present chairman, Mr. Leo T. Crowley, of Madison, Wis., succeeded Mr. Cummings in February 1934, confidence in banks had been largely restored, but there remained the task of putting those banks which were members of the fund in a condition which would minimize losses to the depositors and to the Corporation. This was necessary in view of the fact that banks could gain membership in the fund upon a mere showing of solvency, a test which events and experience have demonstrated is not sufficient protection either to the depositors or to the fund. Due to the fact that the first examinations of the banks were of necessity hasty and somewhat cursory, owing to the short time between the formation of the Corporation on September 11, 1933, and the time when the insurance of deposits went into effect, namely, January 1, 1934, it was imperative to reexamine many of the banks for the purpose of correcting unsound practices and restoring the impairment of capital which was found to exist in all too many banks. That many of the banks should be in a weakened and deplorable condition is not to be wondered at when it is recalled that from 1921 through 1932 almost 11,000 banks suspended, involving five billions of deposits. This represents an average of over 900 banks with deposits of over $400,000,000 suspending during every year of this period. This record presents a striking contrast to the experience during the first year of Federal deposit insurance. During 1934 only 57 licensed banks, with deposits of about $37,000,000, suspended operations. Of this number, 9 banks, with less than $2,000,000 of deposits, were insured.

My own State, Illinois, furnishes a good example of the improvement which has taken place. During this same period, 1921 through 1932, an average of 63 banks, with deposits of about $38,000,000, suspended. In 1934 only 2 licensed banks suspended, and their deposits totaled only $360,000.

This record bears strong witness to the success of the program of bank rehabilitation made necessary by the debacle of March 1933 and carried out by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation during the past 15 months.

Fortunately for the country, Mr. Crowley perceived the impossibility of creating an insurance fund which would be large and strong enough merely to pay out losses. He and his associates pursued the rehabilitation program with a vigor and persistency worthy of emulation by all Government officials. The problem was to place the capital position of the banks upon a basis that bore a reasonable relation to the amount of their deposits. In other words, the deposit liability of the bank should not be grossly out of proportion to its unimpaired capital. The standard of $1 of unimpaired capital for every $10 of deposits was largely used in determining whether banks were safe risks for their depositors and the Corporation.

In order to establish this ratio it was necessary to get the needed capital either through local contributions or through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Up to December 31, 1934, 5,451 banks received additional capital amounting to $851,296,000. Of this number, 1,759 were national banks and 3,692 were State banks. The R. F. C. contributed $440,827,000 to the national banks and $410,469,000 to the State banks. Local contributions to State banks amounted to around $227,000,000, which includes a substantial proportion of deposits which were converted into stock and which may be considered in a certain sense as constituting local contributions. To my mind, these figures are eloquent evidence of the fine accomplishments of the F. D. I. C., the splendid cooperation of the R. F. C., and the practical patriotism of the local communities. It is no exaggeration to say that were it not for the united efforts of the governmental agencies and the sacrificing spirit of the stockholders and depositors the banking system of the United States would probably have collapsed and fallen to pieces. As is always the case, these magnificent results were not obtained without hard work and laborious negotiations. I think it is only fair to give credit to the officials and personnel of the F. D. I. C. for a great deal of the success of this rehabilitation program. It is largely through their efforts that the various State supervising authorities were persuaded to induce the officers and stockholders of the weaker banks to apply to the R. F. C. for needed capital or to raise the necessary funds through local contributions. Had it not been for the zeal and energy which the responsible authorities of the F. D. I. C. exhibited, little would have been done toward correcting the unhealthy condition which many of the banks were in.

The Corporation has done an equally good job in discharging its liabilities to depositors of closed banks. The contrast between the system which prevailed in the old general receiverships and that used by the Corporation is made very tangible and concrete by the fact that claims of depositors in the nine banks which closed during 1934 were paid on the average within 10 days after the Insurance Corporation took control of the banks' affairs. I have no doubt that many of you have personal knowledge and experience of cases where depositors under the old method did not receive all of their money for months and even years after the bank had closed its doors. The nine banks which closed had a total deposit liability of $1,900,000 and the insured liability of the Corporation totaled $950,000. As these banks are still being liquidated, it is impossible to tell what the eventual loss to the Corporation will be, but it is estimated that it will not be very large.

While the F. D. I. C. may not be as well known as some of the other new-deal agencies, you can get some idea of its size and importance and wide-spread influence when you consider the following facts:

On January 1, 1935, 14,212 banks were members of the Temporary Insurance Fund. There are only about 1,060 commercial banks in the whole United States which are not members. The membership is made up of the following classes of banks: 7,702 State nonmember banks, 5,462 national banks, 980 State member banks, and 68 mutual savings banks.

As of October 1, 1934, the last date for which these figures are available, 14,125 banks belonging to the fund had 51,250,000 depositors. Fifty million four hundred thousand depositors were fully insured. Only 800,000 were partly insured. The 14,125 banks had total deposits of over $37,000,000,000, of which $16,500,000,000 were insured. This tremendous financial liability of the Corporation is equal to more than half of the total debt of the United States Government.

For those of you who like percentages, 98.5 percent of all of the depositors were fully insured under the present $5,000 maximum limit. If the present limit were raised, the liability of the Corporation would be increased to almost $30,000,000,000, and such an undertaking would probably destroy the fund and provide additional coverage for only one out of every 100 additional depositors. Nine thousand nine hundred and sixty-eight banks have a ratio of insured to total deposits of 80 percent or over. This means that 69 percent of all of the insured banks are at least 80 percent insured. In this classification are 54 percent of the national banks, 44 percent of the State member banks, and 83 percent of the insured State nonmember banks.

Since June 30, 1934, the deposits of all the insured commercial banks and trust companies increased from $35,800,000,000 to $39,000,000,000, a rise of $3,200,000,000.

These facts and figures demonstrate that the F. D. I. C. plays an important part in the lives of almost half of the entire population of the country. Its influence is, or will be, felt not only in the great metropolitan centers, but also in the outlying and sparsely settled rural sections. It safeguards the deposit of the widow, the farmer, the laborer, the merchant, the manufacturer, and the investor. It has allayed fears of runs in Wall Street and has prevented the tragedies of bank closings in Main Street. If you have the best interests of bank depositors at heart, and I may say this Corporation has made it politically expedient for you to do so, and if you desire to have this Corporation continue to be a stabilizing and steadying influence in our banking system, you must give the Corporation the power it is seeking in the bill now pending. The surest way to defeat deposit insurance and to bring about another paralysis of our banking is to deny to the Corporation its right to examine banks before and after they are admitted to the Fund and to make it a mere disbursing agency without a voice in the supervision of going banks and the liquidation of closed banks. For myself, I intend to carry out the wishes of my constituents by doing everything within my power to increase the safety of their deposits and the soundness and efficiency of the F. D. I. C.

It is my firm conviction that an institution which has been as ably administered as the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and which has carried out the legislative intent so well and so faithfully deserves the approbation and encouragement of this body. I, therefore, trust that my fellow members will see fit to adopt the proposals the officials of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation have made in this bill as a result of their earnest study and consideration, seasoned as it is by over 15 months of first-hand experience of the operation and effect of the original law. I hope that this measure will receive the enthusiastic support not only of Members on this side of the House but also of our distinguished opponents. Insurance of deposits is neither partisan nor political. It is intimately connected with the economic and financial welfare of almost half of our population. It is truly a new deal for depositors and the country at large. It is for the large and small, the rich and poor, the townspeople and the country folk. It has been the salvation of our banking system. It must not be allowed to fail. [Applause.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. Has the gentleman considered the advisability of limiting the deposit insurance to $5,000?

Mr. IGOE. That is where the limit should be placed.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman thinks it should be placed at $5,000, rather than to have it regardless of the amount?

Mr. IGOE. I think it should not be increased beyond $5,000. I think that is the opinion of the people who have given study to this matter.

Mr. PIERCE. What reason can be given for limiting it to $5,000? Why should not the man who has $10,000 reap the benefit?

Mr. IGOE. There are many reasons. One is because the cost of the insurance would be much higher and those persons possessed of $10,000 are not as much in need of protection as those possessing $5,000 or less.

Mr. ARNOLD. Would it not have the effect of causing deposits to be invested in industrial activities rather than be piled up in the banks?

Mr. IGOE. That is true. [Applause.]

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

THE OMNIBUS BANKING BILL

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I shall confine my remarks to only two aspects of the pending legislation, one relating to title I and the other to title II.

The first concerns the provision revised in the bill as originally introduced, requiring that State banks must join the Federal Reserve System by July 1, 1937, in order to be entitled to the benefits of deposit insurance. This provision, I am very happy to say, has been stricken by the committee. I sincerely trust that my colleagues will see fit to support the committee's action in this respect.

Wisconsin has traditionally and politically been an advocate of an independent banking system and the friend of the small banker. From the earliest days of its pioneers and settlers down to our times the liberty-loving Germans, Norwegians, Irish, Scotch, and Polish, together with Yankees from New England, led by men like Carl Schurz, Colonel Dodge, W. D. Hoard, Robert Marion La Follette, E. I. Kidd, John J. Blaine, and others, fought for a banking system which served the needs of the community. Had it not been for the jealous manner in which the banking system was guarded and kept free by these pioneers and leaders, the thriving communities which today dot the whole State of Wisconsin might never have come into being.

The small Wisconsin banker has played a major part in the development of the State's great dairy business, its diversified manufacturing enterprises, its wonderful system of schools and roads, its vast natural resources, its famed resorts and recreational sections. In a word, the small-town banker has helped to weave the very fiber and structure of the State's economic, educational, and everyday life. Hence it is that the people of Wisconsin have naturally come to take a genuine pride in the part that the independent banker has taken to advance the State to its present state of importance in our country.

For these and other reasons, I am opposed to the investiture of vast centralized institutions with complete domination and control of the credit needs of the community. Experience has demonstrated that large banks cannot and do not take the place of locally owned banks in smaller communities. The local banker, through his lifetime association with his fellow citizens and neighbors, is better able to appraise the needs and the credit risks of his customers than is a stranger sent in by a large bank to operate one of its branches. The relationship which exists between the local banker and his depositor is one that can never be achieved by outside interests.

While it is true that many of the smaller banks throughout the country and also in Wisconsin experienced great difficulties of one kind or another, nevertheless recent surveys have shown that the losses incurred by the smaller banks upon their loans were considerably less than those resulting from depreciation of their investments. To my mind, this is striking proof of the fact that the local banker is a good judge of the credit risk and needs of the people he serves. It is also an indictment of the large eastern banks and security houses, upon whom can be placed the responsibility of having filled the investment portfolios of many of our banks with securities of doubtful value.

No doubt most of you are familiar with the practice of large banking houses in the offering of securities to their country correspondents in the banking business. The offerings listed class A–1 securities, and other offerings listed class B securities. If the buyer took some class B offerings, he also got some of the choicer class A offerings. These securities were in turn sold by the country banker to his customers, and as a result the investing public absorbed huge blocks of class B securities. Like block-booking in the motion-picture industry, the country banker, and through him the investing public, were sold junk along with good investments. Another unethical trick worked by large banks and investment houses was to make a doubtful loan, because there was a fat commission in it, and then work it off on the public by means of a bond issue, a preferred-stock issue, or both. If the loan was large enough, it could be further diversified by different classes of stocks and bonds. This method of high finance reached its acme of perfection when the Napoleons of finance discovered that instead of floating one such financial set-up they could combine five or six of them, and top it all off with a holding company, which, in its turn, could also issue doubtful securities which could be and were secured by the class B securities of operating companies. What a saturnalia of financial debauchery resulted! The tragedy of it was the disillusionment of the investing public, its loss of confidence in bankers everywhere, its withdrawal of funds through fear, and the collapse of our entire banking system.

There are other reasons why the action of the committee in deleting the provision about compulsory membership in the Federal Reserve System should be supported. I think those of you who represent States which had to pass enabling legislation to permit your own banks to become members of the temporary deposit insurance fund will find that such legislation was passed upon the express understanding that the State banks would not have to go into the Federal Reserve System in order to obtain the insurance. I know that this was so in the case of my own State when, in 1933, the legislature amended our laws to permit the State banks of Wisconsin to qualify for membership in the deposit fund. It therefore seems to me that the question of the integrity and good faith of the Congress is involved. I think you will agree with me when I say that a large majority of the banks throughout the United States have supported the Federal insurance of deposits upon the assumption and understanding that they would not be forced or driven into the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Does the gentleman take the position that membership in the Federal Reserve System should operate unit banking in the country?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Not necessarily.

It is perfectly obvious that compulsory membership in the Federal Reserve System is the first step toward a unification of all of the banks in the country. It is equally obvious that once the State banks are corraled into the System they will soon lose their identity as State institutions. This means, of course, that their supervision and regulation would be taken away from the State authorities and vested in Washington. I am satisfied that very few, if any, of the several States are now ready to surrender this sovereign right of regulation to the Federal Government, and I, for one, am unalterably opposed to such a surrender of our rights.

December 31, 1934, there were 623 licensed banks in the State of Wisconsin. Six hundred and seven of these were insured. They were classified as follows: Four hundred and eighty-three were State banks not members of the Federal Reserve System, 106 were national banks, 13 were State bank members of the Federal Reserve System, and 5 were mutual savings banks. The fact that the Federal Reserve System has been in operation for about 22 years and has succeeded in getting only 13 State banks in Wisconsin to become members is positive proof that the people of the State do not want their banks to be forced into the System. I think the same sentiment exists throughout the rest of the country, since only a little over 900 State banks in the entire United States have become members of the Federal Reserve System since its inauguration in 1913.

There can be no doubt but that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has done a good job and will become a permanent part of our financial and banking structure. For that reason I think the committee's action in doing away with the requirement of membership in the Federal Reserve System as a condition precedent to deposit insurance ought to be vigorously sustained. To impose onerous burdens as conditions precedent to obtaining the benefits of insurance seems to me to be short-sighted and inimical to the best interests and to the future well-being and development of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. There appears to be grave danger that if we were to compel 7,000 or more State banks to join the Federal Reserve System before they could get their deposits insured, there might be such a united resistance to the whole proposition as would result in a virtual nullification of the beneficent purposes of insuring the money of the depositor. That is to say, if you make membership in the fund so burdensome and unattractive as to alienate more than half of the banks in the United States, you may find that the present plan of protecting the depositor would be a curse instead of a blessing.

Since the temporary insurance fund was started in January 1934, there has been a great increase in the deposits of the Wisconsin banks in keeping with the rise shown by banks in other States. I know from my own knowledge that the confidence of the people in the banks has been restored and there is no longer any of the fear that gripped the depositors in the dark days of 1933. Only two small banks which were members of the temporary fund failed in Wisconsin since January 1934. Depositors received their money from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation within 10 days after the banks had failed. This in itself is one of the strongest reasons for the enactment of the permanent law for the insurance of deposits since it demonstrates that when banks fail the savings and earnings of the depositors will not be tied up for months or even years as was sometimes the case. I am reliably informed that in the case of one of the Wisconsin banks which closed the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation will effect a recovery of almost 75 percent. This is a remarkable performance and gives an accurate idea of how well the Corporation is discharging its obligations and accomplishing its purposes.

It must be remembered that the Corporation steps in as a receiver and takes over the assets of the defaulting bank and is subrogated to all claims of the defaulting bank. In this manner the Corporation is able to discharge quickly and without friction or difficulty its obligation as insurer to the public. Such subrogation, to all rights of the depositor is limited however, to the amount of the payment.

The banking system of Wisconsin was in a greatly weakened condition on account of the severe strains put upon it by the collapse of industry and prostration of agriculture. Today the entire banking structure has been so rebuilt and reconstructed that it is in perhaps a better condition than it has ever been. This has been accomplished by the spirit of loyalty and sacrifice of the stockholders of Wisconsin banks who, by their contributions, made possible the aid extended by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In this program of rehabilitation the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation through the wise, the tactful, and withall, the efficient management of its chairman, Mr. Leo Crowley, who has at all times stood ready to aid and counsel and befriend, has been a tremendous help, as it was largely through the efforts of this organization and its chairman that the necessary negotiations were initiated and the requisite plans and reorganizations worked out. It is not too much to say that the teamwork displayed by the stockholders, the R. F. C., and the F. D. I. C. has resulted in making the Wisconsin banks sounder and their deposits safer than they have ever been since the first charter was issued.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Does not the gentleman believe that if all the banks in the country were in the Federal Reserve System it would be a great protection to the great Deposit Insurance Corporation?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I do not want to enter into any debate about a unified banking system. I appreciate that there is an argument in favor of it, but I come from a rural race that believes in the independence of the individual and his right to work out and solve his own problems. I personally feel I do not want all the powers of the banks centralized right here in Washington.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I fully respect the opinions held by the gentleman, which are contrary to mine, but I am wondering if he has had an opportunity to consider the additional advantages and the real benefits which the Federal Reserve System is now extending to nonmember banks under this bill.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I, perhaps, am not as well or as thoroughly acquainted with them as the gentlemen of the committee, but I appreciate that a great deal has been done, and it has been a blessing that it has been done.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I assume the gentleman also understands that under the proposed section 202, which was submitted to us by the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and had his approval, all qualifications for entrance or admission to the Federal Reserve System as of July 1, 1937, were being waived, and that any bank enjoying the benefits of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation would be eligible for membership in the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Which, of course, would mean that their qualifications have already been checked.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That is correct.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. All right. I should like next to address myself to title II of the pending bill and more particularly to that provision which vests in the Federal Reserve Board the credit and monetary control.

I am not deluding myself with the vain and futile hope that this title will eliminate depressions, nor do I feel that Government control is perfect, and, that therefore, if we pass this measure, our financial ills will be over. In fact I am exceedingly skeptical of title II. If it were possible to pass titles I and III, without title II, I should be in favor of such a movement. If, however, we must take title II in order to secure titles I and III, then I shall vote for it. But I shall do so with my eyes open and the knowledge that the future is by no means financially secure. In any event, bankers' control has been a failure, and I am prepared to support a policy which deprives them of control in the future. I believe that one of the inherent powers of any Government is the right to control its monetary system.

I am not unmindful of the fact that governments are made up of human beings, and that human beings means the human equations. The human equation is not perfect and must always sooner or later produce mistakes. These mistakes, when made with money and banking, affect millions of lives and result in untold agony and misery. Yet, how is it possible to set up any control without the human equation? We must use somebody and in the face of our experience in the not far distant past, I prefer to trust the Government rather than to place any more reliance on selfish and grasping market manipulators, who passed themselves off on society as bankers and investment brokers.

Far too long have we suffered from the domination and control of Wall Street. We have had enough of the type of control exercised by the big bankers. It is high time the Mitchells, the Wiggins, and the other pirates of finance were driven from the temple. We must release the fingers of the financial giants from the credit pulse of the Nation. There must be no repetition of the damnable practice of the banks loaning depositors money to feed the fires of speculation. We must have men in control of our credit requirements who will not be so blinded by selfish interests that they cannot read the handwriting upon the wall of impending disaster. The flow of credit must be so regulated and supervised that the small business man will be able to get his share. Stringency in the money market must not be manipulated to the advantage of the few and the detriment of the many. Vesting control in the Federal Reserve Board of the credit and monetary forces of the country has been long overdue. The blessings of a free government can never be achieved by the present system of domination by private banking. Private banking has had a fair trial; it has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Private bankers cannot now complain if by their conduct they have forfeited all rights to our confidence and our trust.

I well recall back in 1912 when we campaigned—and I was one of them—for the present Federal Reserve System.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. We were quite enthusiastic that depressions had been solved and that financial ills were a thing of the past; that from then on we would never again experience a depression. I have learned since by not only general experience, but my own bitter personal experience that that was not true, and so I am somewhat skeptical about the present cure for future ills in the financial world.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes.

Mr. KENNEY. Does the gentleman know why the Democratic platform of 1912 declared against a central bank?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I do not.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Do I understand the gentleman to be criticizing the bill upon the ground that title II does not take control of the monetary system and credit policy away from the bankers and vest it in a Government agency?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I am only too glad that it is being taken away from the bankers.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I understood the gentleman a moment ago to be criticizing title II of the bill upon the ground that it did not do that.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. The thing I wanted to point out was that the old system relied on human control. The present system will rely on human control. Now, if it comes to which humans I must trust, I prefer the Government 100 percent to the bankers who have had it and have failed so miserably in their control.

But I appreciate this fact, and I think the gentlemen of the committee will agree with me that if you are going to attempt to stabilize and regulate you have these so-called "controls" to be exercised by a central banking system. That is the open-market manipulations, the discount rate, and so on. Rather than putting it all in the control of the Government or whatever party is in office, because I have no feeling about it politically, I would be perfectly willing to trust the present President with it; I would rather have it so diversified in its personnel that it could not be all one thing, let us say, all of the majority party, such as it is now all of a certain class of bankers. I would rather have diversification so that there would be a check one on the other.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I know the gentleman has been here like myself attentively throughout the debates. The gentleman has heard this title II very severely criticized by speakers on the minority side on the ground that it did transfer control over the monetary system of the country from a private to a governmental agency. I was rather disturbed by what the gentleman said a few moments ago, which indicated the thought in his mind, that there was not any change whatever made in that control, and on that ground he was not favorable to title II of the bill. I may have misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I will tell the gentleman that I will go along on any proposition that will take it out of the hands of those who now and have in the past had control of it. The gentleman and I see alike on that point.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman I am one on the majority side of the House who always listens to the gentleman and has a very high regard for his views and judgment.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I thank the gentleman. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the Committee, I am not appearing before you again merely for the purpose of making a speech. As you well know, I was interrupted so much day before yesterday in my humble effort to discuss the major proposals in title II of this bill that I did not have an opportunity to fully complete my exposition. Again, I want to emphasize that the heart of title II, and the outstanding major objective to be accomplished through this legislation, is the complete centralization of the responsibility and authority for control over the volume of our money in a central body, the Federal Reserve Board, charged with the public interest. Without this legislation it is almost futile to attempt any fundamental changes in our present haphazard, confused, and inequitable economic system. Selfishness in human nature will never be voluntarily eradicated. The weaknesses and frailties of man are here to stay. In supporting this great humanitarian and constructive legislation I do not make the claim that through its operations we will reach the millennium in government. It will probably do as much toward that ultimate end as any law of man could do. True, it is revolutionary, though it is not a new step in the conception of the duty of a central government. I have for more than 2 years contended, privately and publicly, that the policies of the new deal would rise but to fall again unless a governmental agency, through the power of Congress, initiated and operated the monetary policies of the Nation. In the light of changing economic conditions and the attitude of the people in their demands for more effective economic protection and security, nothing that we may do here will have any permanent beneficial effect unless there is control of the "lifeblood" for the public interest. Though we should continue to carry on our financial operations through the banking system, except where it can be done legitimately without resorting to borrowing, I think we should not forget that the power to issue money and regulate its value is the sole prerogative of Congress. I mean it belongs to society. We should therefore never feel an utter dependence upon private banking. Frankness compels me to state that the fault heretofore has not been in the stars or altogether in the perfectly human bankers, but in ourselves, that we are underlings.

To my thinking, this bill marks the most forward step in liberal government ever taken by this country. It is the most important banking and monetary-policy legislation that has been presented to Congress since the Civil War. If the goal placed before the Federal Reserve Board, as provided in the bill, is attainable within the scope of monetary action and credit administration, we may reasonably expect an improved and more righteous economic system in America. No sane person with a semblance of knowledge of these matters would, however, claim that all of our troubles, inequalities, and dislocations can be cured through monetary action. So far as the creation of business activities, with resultant profits, is concerned, money must be kept in useful circulation. Under our system money is created by debts, and only by spending can there be any income. Its effectiveness, of course, is dependent upon the speed with which it moves, as well as the amount involved.

All of us now realize that in a capitalistic economy unemployment will always be with us unless there is from now on a more equitable distribution of the Nation's production wealth. This should be progressive, and its success will depend on other factors coordinated with monetary policies.

I am sure that you will be interested to know that the last report of the Brookings Institute for the year 1929, giving the figures of the distribution of the national income, shows that one-tenth of 1 percent of the families at the top of the list received as much income as 42 percent of the families at the bottom of the list; or, translated differently, the average income per family at the top was equivalent to the average income of 420 families at the bottom. In the same connection it might also be interesting to you to know that the report of the Bureau of Economics of the Department of Commerce shows the startling information that in the same year, 1929, more than 68 percent of the American families had a gross income of less than $1,500.

Some of my good friends on the other side of the Chamber have missed no opportunity during the debate on this bill to criticise the Government's spending program. Unless private business is willing to spend, and it will not unless there is a reasonable opportunity for profit in sight, what else can a Government do under its obligation to protect the people against the ravages of destitution and starvation? Who is there among us who would criticize the Government that provided food for his own children when the cupboard was bare and there was no work to be found? Who is there with a conscience in his soul and a spark of humanity in his heart who would balance a budget at the expense of starving children? With all this criticism, no small portion of which comes from partisan minds, the recent report of the Treasury Department showing that the regular Budget of the Government was balanced for the first time in 5 years, could hardly make for them pleasant reading. To us on this side, however, it was, considering the difficult problem facing the Treasury Department, a pleasant and agreeable surprise and but confirmed our faith in the splendid financial leadership of this administration. It is true that our extraordinary budget shows nothing but a big deficit in dollars and cents, but translated into the saving and rehabilitation of human lives and the production of faith and happiness it would show a permanent surplus and tell another story. It should be highly gratifying to those of us who believe in the purposes of the new deal that, notwithstanding the increase in the national debt from twenty billions at the beginning of the administration to approximately thirty billions today, the present aggregate cost of carrying this increased debt is less than the cost was in carrying the $20,000,000,000 debt which we inherited from the Hoover administration. The sound and effective operations of the Treasury Department, together with the increased faith and confidence on the part of investors in our Government securities, has resulted in a reduction in the interest rate on bonds of more than 1½ percent per annum.

Now, may I conclude by giving you my opinion as to the benefits which are likely to accrue to the American people as a result of the passage of this bill and other financial measures which have been enacted into law during the Roosevelt administration?

The extreme cyclical periods of booms and depressions should be avoided. Though normal fluctuations will inevitably occur from time to time in prices, trade and business, the piratical, gyrating dollar of the past quarter of a century will be outlawed. A premium rather than a discount will be put upon the public interest and the average man's welfare. It should insure a normal flow of money at reasonable rates and thereby eliminate from time to time the fear of inflation or deflation. In using the words "inflation" and "deflation", I mean unjustified expansion or unjustified contraction. Through the honest, common sense, effective administration of this measure the purchasing power of all classes of our people, the high and the low, the rich and the poor, will be safeguarded against the callous and ruthless manipulation of a few greed-blind bankers who have for almost a century had in their hands the control of the levers of our financial and economic system. It should bring to the average man the assurance of security in his home, his livelihood, and his savings. Through this measure, the money world forms a partnership with the real world. It involves a complete divorcement of private banking from national monetary operations, without in any wise depriving the honest, private banker of his right and freedom to lend when, how, to whom, and where he pleases. My candid opinion is that it will strengthen our banking system and increase public confidence in private banking institutions. It recognizes the small country banker's problems and undertakes to place him, so far as Government assistance goes, on a parity with the big banker. Let not the chorus of critics, many of whom will raid the Treasury to protect their own business any time, and the propaganda of the "boys in the know" frighten you from the duty and opportunity for constructive public service which the adoption of this measure offers. Instead of being troubled, my friends, in its consideration, there is cause for rejoicing. It should in time be the deliverance of a great people, and in truth should be called "The Financial Emancipation Proclamation of the Twentieth Century."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARLEY].

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. Chairman, having been a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and a member of the Seventy-third Congress which passed the deposit insurance law, I must confess to be very much gratified at the almost universal popularity of the law and the very fine things that have been said regarding it. I want to remind you of this, however, that the guaranty-insurance deposit law did not always have such smooth sailing. In the early sessions of the Seventy-third Congress we had just about the same opposition, from the same sources, almost identically in the same manner that we are now having opposition on title II of the bill. I have a feeling that if this bank law is passed as it has been written, and as it is now under consideration, that in 2 years' time title II will be just as popular as the insurance provision in the law at the present time.

I think we can all agree that insurance of bank deposits came into the Federal law at a time when there was the greatest need for restoration of public confidence in the banking structure of our country. I think, too, we can agree that the general acceptance of the principle has operated to restore and maintain that confidence. We are engaged in an effort to work constructively toward the end that there may never be in our country a repetition of the financial collapse that has accompanied the late persistent depression. We can work toward this end and succeed with the cooperation of all who are immediately concerned with the safety of bank deposits—that is, ultimately with the public who deposit money, and can support their leaders in Congress in passing the administration banking bill.

When a man goes to make a loan from a bank, the bank demands some kind of security. The people who deposit and thus loan their money to the banks have in a real sense demanded that their banks carry insurance on deposits. That is the meaning of the wholesale withdrawal of deposits and hoarding in the 3 years following 1929.

Depressed security, agriculture, commodity, and real-estate values, followed by a sharp reduction in our national income, left many banks with investments which were fundamentally sound but badly frozen. At the same time there was a steadily increasing demand from depositors who were compelled to draw upon their reserves to meet the problems caused by reduced incomes and unemployment. Thus the banks were drained of their normal liquid resources and forced to realize upon their frozen assets at great sacrifices. As this liquidation continued, their remaining assets became more badly frozen, more greatly depressed. But they might have survived had not the specter of lost confidence, followed by fear, and then by panic, driven hordes of depositors to their counters to demand their money not because they needed it, but because of fear of loss. The general economic decline weakened our banks, but it was the consequence of hoarding which closed their doors in many instances. In the interval between the closing of banks in Michigan by the Governor of that State on February 14, 1933, and the closing of every bank in the United States by Presidential proclamation 3 weeks later, the staggering sum of $1,630,000,000 in cash was withdrawn from the Nation's banks.

Nor was this all. In the 12 months prior to December 31, 1932, deposits in banks had dropped by approximately $4,000,000,000 during the very period when the President and Secretary of the Treasury were conducting an intensive campaign against hoarding by speeches and patriotic appeals. But they might as well have attempted to sweep back the tides with a broom. At the same time the people were flocking to the United States Postal Savings System. Why? Because the credit of the United States was pledged to secure these deposits, and the people wanted this protection. At that time the Postal Savings System was the only depository available to the ordinary depositor which was in a sense insured. Between June 30, 1931, and April 30, 1933, deposits in this System increased from $347,000,000 to $1,159,000,000. This increase occurred notwithstanding the existence of a maximum limit of $2,500 on the aggregate amount of the deposits of any one depositor. What the increase would have been had there been no such limit would be difficult to estimate. Could the people have given a clear indication of their desire for some system of insurance for banks generally?

With financial transactions throughout the country at a standstill, the State legislatures and Congress speedily enacted emergency measures to cope with the situation. On June 16, 1933, Congress enacted the Banking Act of 1933, a law which was aimed at permanently preventing a recurrence of these conditions. The outstanding feature of this act was the creation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, to which the United States Treasury supplied $150,000,000 and the 12 Federal Reserve banks an additional $140,000,000, making up a total initial capital of $290,000,000, which has since been augmented by the collection of an assessment upon banks amounting to almost $40,000,000.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation is charged by Congress with the duty of protecting depositors in insured banks. Every activity of the Corporation is motivated by that objective. This all-important assignment is supplemented by the duty of paying promptly the insured portion of the accounts of depositors in insured banks which for one reason or another close.

The temporary insurance fund has been in operation since January 1, 1934. Fourteen thousand one hundred and thirty-seven banks are now members of this fund. Since the beginning of the fund not a single depositor has lost a penny in a bank which achieved membership. It is well to give this a moment's thought. I do not believe it possible to point to any other period in the history of the United States when for over 16 months not a single dollar of the deposits has been lost amongst so large a group of banks as are represented by the members of the temporary insurance fund.

The Corporation has paid deposits in 12 suspended insured banks. The total deposit liability of these 12 banks at the time they closed was about $3,000,000. Approximately $1,900,000 of this amount represents the insured portion, for which the Corporation was liable. Upon the appointment of a receiver by the responsible supervisory authority the Corporation has immediately undertaken the liquidation of its liability to depositors in these banks. The Corporation began to pay off insured depositors within 10 days of the appointment of a receiver. In one case the Corporation paid off about one-third of the insured deposits, or nearly $50,000 the day following the appointment of a receiver. To my mind this brings home very vividly the tremendous change which has been brought about by the existence of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. It is in striking contrast to the former procedure where the small depositors, who could least afford to do so, were obliged to wait months, even years, before they received any dividends in payment of their hard-earned wages.

It is interesting to note that there are over 9,600 banks in this country today in which deposit insurance, under the present limits, covers 80 percent or more of total deposit liability. Fifty-four percent of all the national banks and 80 percent of all State banks have 80 percent or more of their total deposit liability covered by insurance at the present time. While the extent of the Corporation's liability is not as great in any one of the remaining 4,500 banks, it is, nevertheless, considerable. The reason for pointing out this particular figure is to show you that the Corporation, having a liability to depositors in each of these 9,600 banks, which is at least four-fifths as great as their total deposit liabilities, is vitally concerned with their efficient operation.

In the face of the record since the insurance fund came into effect there should be no occasion to argue its need. However, there are still some who say that it is but a substitute for a sound banking system and that our efforts should be directed toward establishing better management for banks rather than insuring banks against losses. The proponents of this argument usually give the Canadian banking system as an illustration.

The argument for better banks is well taken. We concur fully in what its proponents say, but we feel that better banking can best be achieved with the aid of just such systematic work as is done by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

In the United States there is a division of authority between the several States and the Federal Government, and consequently, unlike the Dominion of Canada, the character of our banking varies according to the location of the bank and the character of supervision given it. Through the work of the Corporation there can be a better coordination throughout the country to the end that a uniform high standard of banking may be maintained.

Again, our system of banking, while unlike the Canadian system up to the present time, through the medium of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, now presents a striking analogy to that of our neighbors to the north. This has been accomplished without sacrificing unit banking which is so strongly favored in many States. The same fundamental safeguard now exists in both systems—that risks and losses shall not be localized in the individual banks, but shall be spread over the entire banking system. Upon this principle has been founded the vast insurance protection now given our people—insurance against the hazards of fires, earthquakes, floods, and other calamities, and even against death, the inevitable destiny of every one of us.

The Corporation has not only restored general confidence in banking institutions but it has seen to it that the confidence is built on a solid foundation by elevating banking practices to a high level of efficiency. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has done much to rehabilitate the depleted capital structure of its member banks. Through cooperation with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Comptroller of the Currency the banks have been placed in a healthy capital position.

The method is as follows: Analyses have been made comparing the ratio of the net sound capital in the subject banks to the total-deposit liabilities. If the ratio of such capital to deposit liability is 10 percent or better the bank is rated no. 1, since under such conditions there exists an ample cushion not only for the risk of the Corporation but for the interest of the depositors and stockholders as well. Where, on the other hand, the ratio falls below this figure, the banks are classified into three rating groups. It is these three groups of banks which are being concentrated on in the effort to repair their capital condition. They have been urged to obtain either local contribution to capital or to make application for R. F. C. money for capital purposes. It is to the best interest of all concerned that every effort be made to place the capital of banks in such a position that a healthy ratio exists between capital and deposits. It is to the credit of the Corporation that it uses its interests and its position to effect so important a remedy as it has done to the capital structure of the country's banks.

More than 16,000 commercial banks with deposits of nearly $9,000,000,000 are known to have suspended operations during the 70-year period prior to 1934. The losses to depositors in these banks are conservatively estimated at $3,000,000,000. The annual rate of losses incurred by depositors in that period was about one-third of 1 percent of the deposits of the entire commercial banking system. Of the $3,000,000,000 of losses in commercial banks, one billion was the amount which depositors of national banks were obliged to assume, while $2,000,000,000 was the amount assumed by depositors in State and private banks. In other words for every $100 of deposits in the commercial-banking system, about 31 cents per year was lost. For $100 of deposits in the national-banking system, 21 cents per year was lost, as against 39 cents per year for every $100 in the State system.

The bill now under consideration contains some features that are a marked improvement over the insurance provisions of the Banking Act of 1933.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Indiana 8 additional minutes.

Mr. FARLEY. In order to minimize the risk of loss in the future and to encourage sound banking, features have been inserted in the pending bill which give to the Corporation the necessary power to improve its insurance risk.

Since time does not permit discussion of all of these features, I shall mention only one—the power of examination.

A report of a bank examination is an instrument by which the management of a bank may learn a great deal. It affords the opportunity for a periodic perspective of the operations of a bank which may not be apparent to those who are working with an individual bank's problems day in and day out. Much has been done by the Corporation already toward unification of the examination report for, partly, the sake of greater ease in analysis, but chiefly to avoid a multiplicity of unwelcome examinations. Much has been done through an improved examination form to afford a closer connection between the Corporation and the insured bank, which doubtless reacts favorably for both; but more might be done with the help of the proposed new legislation. With reports of examinations before it, the Corporation will be in a position to enforce the correction of conditions in banks before losses are sustained, and if those conditions are not corrected the banks would be required to proceed without insurance, but with ample notice to their depositors that insurance has been withdrawn. Under the terms of the bill protection will not be withdrawn as to the depositors until they have had an ample opportunity to know and to act as they choose upon such information.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation should be supported in its request for authority to terminate the membership of any bank in the fund which persists in so conducting itself and its affairs as to be constantly increasing the probability of ultimate suspension with the consequent loss to depositors and this Corporation. The existence of deposit insurance places upon the Corporation and upon Congress a moral obligation for sound management of banks as well as a very definite responsibility to bank depositors. If insured banks engage in practices which are detrimental to the depositors, the Corporation must have the right to withdraw its endorsement of those banks.

The benefits of deposit insurance are not limited to the protection of individual depositors. The entire banking structure of the country is so intimately interwoven that disturbances in any part of it can cause repercussions of far-reaching proportions. The benefits which will accrue because of greater stability in the banking structure are real and tangible. For these reasons I believe that all banks, large and small, should be required to support the insurance system.

And yet the small depositor is he for whom deposit insurance is designed. The small depositor must be assured the absolute protection of his deposit. The hardships which the recent untoward economic conditions have developed have been felt most acutely by that large group of people whose right it is to have absolute protection for those hard-earned dollars which are placed to their credit for the so-called "rainy day." The insurance of such savings, which it is the right of every man to enjoy, is essentially a Government function. Just as the Constitution offers every man the protection of law and order, so should the Government insure in the best-known way the protection of the deposits of the masses.

BANKING ACT OF 1935—SECTION 210. REAL-ESTATE LOANS

Section 210 would amend section 24 of the Federal Reserve Act so that the conditions under which real-estate loans may be made by national banks will be prescribed henceforth by regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, except that (1) the amount of any such loan hereafter made shall not exceed 60 percent of the appraised value of the real estate at the time the loan is made; and (2) the aggregate amount of such loans which any bank may make shall not exceed the capital and surplus of the bank or 60 percent of its time and savings deposits, whichever is the greater.

The purposes of this amendment are to increase the ability of commercial banks to serve their communities, to provide a greater outlet for the banks' funds, and to promote business recovery by opening up the mortgage market and reviving the construction industry.

Few banks are purely commercial, since a large part of the deposits in the banks represents savings. Member banks hold in the aggregate as much as $10,000,000,000 of savings funds. Separation of commercial banking from savings banking in this country at the present time is an academic question, as it could not be accomplished now without disrupting the banking system. So long, moreover, as commercial banks continue to accept and hold a large amount of the people's savings they should use at least a part of these funds in long-time loans and investments.

In using savings funds for long-time investments, there are no outlets that would serve a more useful economic purpose at the present time than real-estate loans. The restoration of building activity to something like a normal level is absolutely essential to further business recovery, and to this end reestablishment of an active mortgage market would greatly contribute. At the present time the banks of the country have a vast amount of funds for which they can find no profitable outlet. Increased activity in real-estate loans would, therefore, be of importance to the banks in helping them to make reasonable earnings and would at the same time enable them to render the proper service to their communities, as well as to contribute to recovery.

Member banks have an enormous volume of excess reserves, and at the same time they are neglecting a broad field of real-estate loans in which there is an opportunity to place their funds. Commercial banks, which are surfeited with funds, are refraining from making real-estate loans in any considerable volume, while building-and-loan associations, which are anxious to make such loans, lack funds for the purpose and are endeavoring to obtain funds from the Government. The Government, on the other hand, is pouring money into the real-estate loan field through various agencies, such as the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the lending agencies under the Farm Credit Administration. If commercial banks increased the volume of their loans on real estate, special Government agencies would not be under the same pressure to make these loans, the banks' ability to make a living would improve, and their usefulness to their communities would increase.

There is no logic in prescribing rigid limitations as to the proportion of a bank's funds that can be invested in real-estate loans when the proportion of their funds that can go into bonds and other kinds of long-time uses is not restricted.

The record of real-estate loans during the depression has not been worse than that of many other classes of loans and investments. Real-estate loans, however, have differed from other long-time investments, such as bonds, in that there was no organized market where they could be sold even at a reduced value. As compared with commercial loans, real-estate loans have also suffered from ineligibility as a basis of borrowing at a Federal Reserve bank. In consequence, real-estate loans which might have been good in substance, despite being temporarily uncollectible, have had to be considered entirely frozen because, until the emergency legislation of February 1932, temporary accommodation could not be obtained from the Reserve banks on these loans as security. The elimination by this bill of rigid eligibility requirements would remove from real-estate loans this serious disability.

This committee in all of its work has undertaken to build and not to destroy. When Mr. Roosevelt came into power and came to Washington he very promptly called large groups of business men, bankers, merchants, manufacturers, representatives of farm groups, and labor groups to Washington for a conference and consultation. They assured him just a little over 2 years ago that they would go along with his program and undertake to put this country back into a prosperous condition. The situation that has arisen in the last few days, the recent past, reminds me very much of an experience in my life when I was in a great storm at sea. I remember one night when practically every passenger was on his knees in the cabins or in the aisles of the ship, but in 24 hours the storm had passed. Then they were out on deck laughing and cheering and apparently forgetting the thing they had prayed for. When I look at the situation today and hear some of the criticisms and objections of the future, I cannot but think that they represent about that situation. Having gone almost down to ruin, in the slough of economic despondency, they pledged their support, but now when we are well on the way out of the depression they come into the city with condemnation, yet without a constructive program.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein the report of the committee dealing with section 210.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Masachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, we have been through long and laborious weeks of hearing witnesses before the Committee on Banking and Currency on the questions involved in this bill. We have heard it said of titles I and III of the bill that they are satisfactory to all, that there is no difference of opinion with reference to them. Titles I and III seem to be acceptable to everybody, not only the Members of the House of Representatives but the public at large. We have heard it said also that with respect to title II the situation is different, that it is controversial, that everything in it is controversial, that there is no unanimity of opinion with regard to it. This attitude, this frame of mind, has interested me as a new Member of this House and of this committee, and I have tried to analyze it. I now challenge the truth of the statement.

As I read title II of the bill its purposes are very simple and very clear: To profit by the lessons we learned in the terrible collapse of the banking structure of the country. The object of the title is to give certain controls over the instrumentalities of credit, to prevent injurious expansion and contraction of the country's credit so that it may be available at all times to the people of this Nation. With this proposition everyone is agreed. Furthermore, everyone is agreed that the only way we can exercise this function of preventing injurious expansion and contraction of credit is by centralizing control over certain instrumentalities. The bill accomplishes just that; it gives to a central body the right to control the rediscount rates, the right to control the reserves of member banks, and the right to conduct what is called "open-market operations" in Government securities. Analyze it further and you will discover that if there is one point of difference it goes only to the extent of the determination of what body shall exercise these controls.

I have before me the report of a committee of the American Bankers' Association. It may surprise you to know that, with the one exception I have mentioned, practically every recommendation contained in that report now is incorporated in the bill. This pretty nearly eliminates the last objection there is to title II of the bill.

Let us for a moment analyze this one remaining difference of opinion as to what body shall exercise these important controls. It comes down to this: As the bill is submitted to you, the Federal Reserve Board is given the power to exercise those functions, to control those levers, which can be operated to expand or contract the country's credit. It calls also, however, for an advisory committee to consist of five representatives of the Federal Reserve banks, chosen by the banks. The recommendation of the committee of the American Bankers' Association is that you substitute for the Federal Reserve Board of eight members, as now constituted, as the agency to exercise these powers a Federal Reserve Board reduced to five members, to which are added four governors of the Federal Reserve banks. I shall make a brief statement in reference to this and then leave it to the Members of this House to determine whether or not there is any real difference.

It has been stated that the bill gives political control over the banks for the reason that the governor of each Federal Reserve bank is to be appointed by the directors of the bank subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board; and to support this view the argument has been advanced that this power to approve the appointments of governors gives the Federal Reserve Board control over each bank. If this be true, if this be a fair statement, then I ask you, what is the difference between giving the powers to the Federal Reserve Board in the first instance, as is done by the bill, and giving the powers to the Federal Reserve Board through their control over the selection of the governors of the Federal Reserve banks as has been argued will happen by this process?

Mr. Chairman, it seems hardly necessary to have spent the time that has been spent in this House arguing and debating a proposition about which everybody is in substantial accord. I doubt if even on the other side of the House there are going to be enough votes against this measure or any part of it really to amount to anything; and I trust that the benefits everybody concedes will be brought about through the operation of this bill if enacted into law will not be lost to the American people because some amendments fail of incorporation in the measure before its passage by this House. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CASTELLOW].

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Chairman, our old laws—and law, as I understand, is in reality nothing more or less than established rules for the direction and restraint of human activity—having in their operation proven unsatisfactory, and in many instances disastrous, we, in this and the preceding Congress, have felt constrained to revamp, so to speak, almost our entire system of government. The rather universal trend of our legislation during these two sessions has been to consolidate and vest in our Federal Government, which in a broad sense is a central authority, a supervisory, if not a distinct and absolute control over the activities of the individual.

Regretfully I realize that as civilization advances and population increases less freedom of action and exercise of individuality can be permitted to the citizen. As the cattle formerly roamed with freedom the broad western plains in proud possession of their long horns without doing violence to their fellows, when crowded into narrow spaces proved the necessity of relinquishing one of their erstwhile most cherished natural possessions, even to the extent of being dehorned. So with mankind, no advantage comes to us unalloyed. As our numbers multiply the freedom of individual activity is restricted. Not only is this principle being applied to the individual but it has been extended to the functions of our various governmental units.

Beyond question in the bill now under consideration we find no reversal of this tendency. By it more power over the very heart of all business and commercial activity is vested in a central authority, which in turn comes more directly under the influence of the executive branch of our Government. This will enure to the benefit of the masses so long as the head of that department is both honest and wise and remains fortunate in the selection of those who, under him, must exercise the broadest discretion, coupled with the power to raise or lower, accelerate or retard, the business of this great Nation. Whoever or whatever controls the credit of the country necessarily performs this function. Too long has it been permitted to remain in the not unselfish hands of the captains of private finance. By them have our people been made to suffer, and hence our justified wish to find a more impartial instrumentality of control.

The greatest weakness of the plan adopted by the original Federal Reserve Act was found in the reflected weakness of human nature from which there seems to be no escape, and a disregard of which only invites disaster. Few laws, I apprehend, were ever enacted which theoretically were unsound and yet we are confronted with the embarrassing knowledge that many have proven to be unworkable. In purpose and beneficent theory was there ever a law which scored higher than the National Prohibition Act? If it has failed, as so many of our people seem to feel, that failure is attributable only to the frailties and selfishness of human nature. So it is, as stated before, with practically every law which has failed in usefulness.

That great and noble President, our beloved Woodrow Wilson, inspired by an almost superhuman love and loyalty to mankind believed it possible to successfully conduct a war to end wars. We need no reminder as to the results.

Under the leadership of that same great mind we brought into being the Federal Reserve, supposed to regulate and control the beat of the heart of our financial structure, the credits of the country. When we view the financial wrecks, and remember the days which seemed as years to some, during the latter part of 1920 and for some time following, we may conclude that it functioned too perfectly. It may be remembered that for some years an unprecedented prosperity had been enjoyed throughout the country, cotton having sold in our local warehouses for more than 40 cents a pound, and other farm products bringing proportionate prices, everything moving as though by magic, and almost universal happiness prevailing throughout the land until that eventful day in 1920, soon after President Harding assumed office, the Federal Reserve Board announced that it would be the policy of Federal Reserve banks to make no further loans to finance the holding of agricultural products. That announcement was immediately followed by one of the most drastic breaks in commodity prices that ever saddened the hearts and reduced to penury such a substantial portion of the Nation's most worthy citizens. Within a few months cotton broke from around 40 cents per pound to something like 10 cents. To the disastrous effect of this pronouncement of policy on the part of the Federal Reserve Board, no commodity was immune, and the farmers of America were dealt a blow from which they have never recovered. The conditions resulting are well depicted in a letter I have recently received from my good friend, and one of the most capable and conscientious officials my native State has ever had the good fortune to boast, Mr. R. E. Gormley, State superintendent of banks for Georgia. Referring to the action of the Federal Reserve Board, heretofore mentioned, his observations were, in part, as follows:

In reading over the report of the House Banking and Currency Committee, I noted the supplemental views of Mr. BROWN of Michigan on pages 26, 27, 28, and 29 in which he makes a rather severe criticism of nonmember banks and presents figures attempting to substantiate his contention that the operation of national and Federal Reserve member banks has been superior to that of nonmember banks. You will note on page 29 that Mr. BROWN of Michigan refers to the fact that in 1921 there were 8,150 national banks with deposits of $12,991,000,000; 1,595 Federal Reserve member State banks with deposits of $7,646,000,000. That there were 20,181 nonmember banks with deposits of $9,529,000,000. Following that he states within the 12-year period following 1921, the total deposits contained in national banks closing amounted to $1,187,000,000 and that in State member banks $680,000,000 and in nonmember banks closing during this period $3,017,000,000. Mr. BROWN's figures are rather misleading in that he does not include in the total deposits of nonmember banks the deposits of approximately 2,000 mutual savings banks which aggregate approximately $6,000,000,000. From a statement which was prepared by the F. D. I. C. at my request dealing with bank suspensions in the period between 1921 and 1935, I obtained the following figures: The total deposits of all national banks in 1921 aggregated $15,136,000,000. In all State banks the total was $23,316,000,000. At the end of 1929 the total deposits of all national banks had increased to $21,586,000,000. The total deposits of all State banks had increased to $36,081,000,000. During this period between 1921 and 1929, it is true the ratio of deposits in national banks closing during that period was only 2.4 percent of the total, while in State banks the ratio of deposits in closed banks was 5.4 percent of the total, a ratio decidedly favorable to the national banks. I make the following analysis of the conditions responsible for this difference.

If you remember, in 1920, immediately after the change in administration, when President Harding went into office, the Federal Reserve Board announced that it would not be the policy of the Federal Reserve banks to make further loans for the purpose of financing the holding of agricultural commodities. As a result of that announcement, the bottom fell out of the price of all farm products. You will remember that cotton dropped from around 38 cents to about 20 cents. Other farm products declined similarly. As a result of that pronouncement of the Federal Reserve Board, a severe blow was dealt to agriculture from which the farmer has never recovered. Since that time the farmer has been in the position of having to sell his products in a market absolutely unprotected by credit of the Federal Reserve banks, while at the same time his supplies purchased were bought in a market which had the protection of the credit resources of the Federal Reserve banks. As a result of the drastic decline in values and the unfair odds which the farmer has had to operate under for the years succeeding 1921, it was only natural that financial conditions should have become more acute or aggravated in the rural sections. The rural sections were served largely by smaller State banks, and it was only natural that the mortality of banks in such rural sections should have been higher than among the larger banks located in industrial centers.

We will now take up the period from 1929 to 1935. In that period this statement prepared by the F. D. I. C. shows that the total deposits of national banks closing during this latter period aggregated $2,646,000,000. The total deposits of State banks closing during a similar period aggregated $3,937,000,000. The ratio of deposits of national banks closing during this latter period compared to their total deposits at the beginning of 1930 is 11.4 percent. The ratio of deposits contained in State banks closing during this latter period is only 10.8 percent of the total amount of deposits at the beginning of 1930. From this latter you will see that the losses in national banks during the latter portion of this period exceeded the percentage of loss in State banks. In other words, when the Federal Reserve Board in 1929 announced it would not be the policy of the Federal Reserve banks to furnish further funds for the purpose of financing speculative transactions on the New York Stock Exchange, the effect on listed securities was the same as the effect of their pronouncement of 1921 of agricultural commodities, and as a result of their latter decree in 1929 values depreciated, not only in the country sections but also in the industrial sections, and as a result it was not only the smaller banks in the agricultural sections which suffered but the larger banks in the financial centers showed a higher percentage of loss than did the State banks.

From the foregoing it would appear that the difficulties with which we have been beset and of which we now complain were precipitated not as a result of a lack of power but as a result of a lack of wisdom and foresight in its application and control. In other words, we might be impressed that the wreck was not the result so much of any inherent defect in the engine but rather due to the lack of foresight, not to mention the possibility of undue influences, upon the part of the train's crew.

While the Federal Reserve Act was yet young, I not only realized the possibilities but predicted the results of which complaint is now being made. Motivated, I hope, by no spirit of pessimism, but endeavoring to proceed in the light of truth, I now inject this word of warning against too much optimism over the result of this or any other legislation. For we are warranted in expecting only that degree of success which we, by our aggregate virtues, merit. As the citizen surrenders more of his individual rights, the more jealously should he regard the exercise of his franchise in the selection of those who shall hereafter exercise the rights and powers so surrendered. It has been my observation that we have suffered not so much by reason of the laws themselves but the manner and spirit exercised in their administration. So, the realization of our hopes and the fruition of our dreams may be permanently established through the improvement of our natures rather than the changing of our laws, for only through the instrumentality of men can laws become effective. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY].

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, the Federal Reserve Act was passed in December 1913. It followed the campaign of 1912 when a Democratic President was elected on a platform which declared against a central bank.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert at this point that plank of the Democratic platform of 1912 relating to banking.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman has that permission.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

BANKING LEGISLATION

We oppose the so-called "Aldrich bill" or the establishment of a central bank; and we believe the people of the country will be largely freed from panics and consequent unemployment and business depression by such a systematic revision of our banking laws as will render temporary relief in localities where such relief is needed, with protection from control or dominion by what is known as the "money trust."

Banks exist for the accommodation of the public, and not for the control of business. All legislation on the subject of banking and currency should have for its purpose the securing of these accommodations on terms of absolute security to the public and of complete protection from the misuse of the power that wealth gives to those who possess it.

We condemn the present methods of depositing Government funds in a few favored banks, largely situated in or controlled by Wall Street, in return for political favors, and we pledge our party to provide by law for their deposit by competitive bidding in the banking institutions of the country, national and State, without discrimination as to locality, upon approved securities and subject to call by the Government.

Mr. KENNEY. When after the election the Congress began working on the new banking system two systems rose before them: On the one side the central bank and on the other side the Federal Reserve Association or System. But the central bank was put out of all consideration because of the plank in the platform declaring against it. Why this plank was made part of the platform is speculative. But, in my opinion, regardless of the declaration of policy with respect to banking in the campaign, it was a great mistake that the Congress did not consider the history and all the facts and circumstances surrounding a central banking system, even though it was committed against it. At least the facts should have been developed to show its merits or demerits. The Federal Reserve System was alone given adequate consideration and was adopted so that it could truly be said, as the plank in the Democratic platform expressed it, "Banks exist for the accommodation of the public and not for the control of business."

The central bank, in my view, Mr. Chairman, operates by natural law, whereas the Federal Reserve System has unnatural features and will continue to have under this bill, with the Government in intended control of the governors of the banking system. In choosing between a central banking system as we find it in England and the Federal Reserve System as it is and as it will be after this—the Banking Act of 1935—is passed, one elects to reject old-fashioned banking for new-fashioned banking.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman going to explain what he means by central or old-fashioned banking?

Mr. KENNEY. I shall try to in the limited time I have.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I will yield the gentleman additional time if he desires it.

Mr. KENNEY. During the days we have just gone through I have been a new-fashioned bankee, but as a lawyer I advised all of my clients to be old-fashioned bankees, and no matter what losses I have sustained, those clients who followed my advice have suffered no losses in their investments. Had the banker, one who deals with other people's money, permitted his people's money to go into recognized good banking channels only, I and so many others would not have sustained our losses. They were sustained under the new-fashioned banking. Under old-fashioned banking we would have been safe.

When the Federal Reserve System came into being in 1913, it was felt that Congress had done a service to the country and perhaps it did, but it did not accomplish all that was intended. Otherwise, this legislation would probably not now be before this House. Under the Reserve System approximately 1,000 banks in this country have failed. And so it is we are today met to try to remedy a system which did not prevent the downfall of so many of our banking institutions. Now, what do we propose to do? This bill puts the Government in the banking system. The Government would control a system which went out of control. Whether that is a good thing or not right now is an open question, but personally I feel it is only another artificial device attached to an artificial system and in the final analysis there will exist interference with the natural law of banking.

Mr. Chairman, when the original Federal Reserve Act was passed, consideration should have been given to two very vital questions. One was considered, very much so, and it was whether a member of the Federal Reserve Board should act as such and at the same time be a commercial banker; that is, affiliated with a concern doing a banking business. There was much controversy over that matter, and finally the President of the United States took the decisive stand that a member of the Board must have severed his relations with his bank or banks and in adopting that policy upheld the principles of old-fashioned banking as practiced by the "old lady of Threadneedle Street", the Bank of England.

When the matter came before the President, he asked the question, Would you expect the railroads of this country to control the Interstate Commerce Commission? As Senator GLASS says in his book, there could be but one answer and the question remained unanswered, so that members of the Board were, opposition disappearing, required to give up their relations with their banks.

The other question, as I view it, should have had equal or even greater consideration. As a matter of fact it seems to have had little or no consideration by the committees or by Congress. That was the question of bank balances. Bank balances under the Federal Reserve Act were allowed to go into the hands of the Federal Reserve banks. Now, the Federal Reserve Board was intended to control the credit of the country. How could the Board under the act actually control the credit of the country? Only by having the Federal Reserve banks submit to their control. The Federal Reserve banks had the bank balances. In order to control credit, the Reserve banks would have to respond to the action of the Board. The Board had to get what it wanted from the Reserve banks and their member banks and resistance might be expected in some cases where the banks knew that in responding to the controlling power they would lose a profit.

Mr. Chairman, what do bank balances indicate? They indicate the trade conditions of the country. The knowledge of trade conditions is essential in the control of credit. Knowing the trade conditions the Reserve Board can undertake to bring about the purchase or sale of gold or other medium of exchange or the purchase or sale of Government bonds, but this gold or other medium or Government obligations are lodged with the Federal Reserve banks and the member banks. They have to be bought or sold by the Federal Reserve banks and the member banks.

Now, the Federal Reserve banks have an equal knowledge with the Federal Reserve Board of bank balances and trade conditions. The Federal Reserve banks have intimate relations with the member banks. The member banks carry a deposit with them and they are in daily contact with each other. These member banks want to know the "news." They ask for and very often are given confidential information. If it is known that the Government is going to buy gold or wants to have gold bought, if gold is the medium of exchange, there is a natural tendency on the part of these member banks and some of the Federal Reserve banks to hold out on the Government. In such event it is more difficult to control the credit situation. In days of danger one of the Reserve banks held out against a high discount rate, as it was stated during the debate, and thus prevented the exercise of control. With bank balances centralized and the resultant knowledge of the conditions also centralized, the natural law could function without interference or resistance.

In England the Bank of England holds the balances of the banks. It also keeps the government balance on hand. No interest is paid to the government or any bank adding to its strength. The stockholders of that bank are the merchants of the country, not commercial bankers.

The directing officials are bankers, but they serve no banking interest, in theory at least. This bank does not go in for the excessive profits reaped by the banks of this country in invading almost every field. It sticks to old-fashioned banking. There is no gigantic cream for the directing officials or even for their merchant stockholders. Salaries and dividends are limited. But the old-fashioned banking has resulted in a tremendous surplus which makes it stand out as a greater bulwark than the rock of Gibraltar. The central banking system of England, with centralized bank balances allowing of a proper control of credit, has, I believe, shown its superiority. As evidence of this there has not been a single bank failure in England during the world-wide depression.

Mr. Chairman, until bank balances are centralized or similarly situated in this country, in my opinion, we will not be able fully to control credit, whether the Government enters the situation or not, and I do not see how the Government can improve conditions. There is too much danger of undue pressure from the Government and a compromise or artificial control supplanting the natural law of banking. Old-fashioned banking, which operates under nature's law, requires that the banks of the country give the right of way to the trade of the country, commerce, industry, and agriculture. The Bank of England does this very thing. In England the bill of exchange stands out as the very best and most desired security. There is an open market for this paper. Consequently, there is competition between the merchant and the banker. We discarded it over here.

We went in for discounts because of the greater profits for the banks; at least, the banks thought there was. A merchant can dispose of his bill of exchange at a rate of something like 3 to 3½ percent. Here, with the bill of exchange out of style under the new-fashioned banking, the banks reap a profit in normal times of almost twice as much by discount. But it has occurred to me sometimes that the banks would be better off with less profit on its discounts and other practices for then the established banks would not have so much competition from new banks that have sprung up like mushrooms over night, cutting in on their business and catering to new-fashioned business which has accounted for the departure of some old banks from its old-fashioned, sound banking principles. It is to the credit of Congress that it has provided for the divorcement of security affiliates from our banks. That is going back to what I mean by old-fashioned banking.

The bill of exchange is prime paper in England. It comes first because it serves the trade of the country. The bill of exchange and government bonds stand up. But the natural law should always prevail and the Government should not encroach upon the facilities intended for business. I wonder whether a great many realize the significance of a bill of exchange. I have not known so long. It was originally intended for the use of merchants. Only merchants could issue a bill of exchange and the reason was that the merchant created new wealth. By means of it trade could often be carried on through credit extended by the merchant seller without the use of any bank.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I might say that this practice obtained in Texas for a great many years and my information is that the constitution of Texas for a long period forbade a bank in that State.

Mr. Chairman, in England the bankers realize that they are bankers—men who handle other people's money. They remain bankers while here many of our bankers develop into capitalists—men who are supposed to handle and use their own money. I have asked the question during debate on the bill why the bill of exchange was discarded in this country. No one seems to dwell upon an answer. But England looks to her trade and the public interest above all and she still retains the bill of exchange.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a quotation from the System of National Finance, by E. Hilton Young and N. E. Young, a British work.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The quotation referred to is as follows:

A bill of the sort (bill of exchange), with good names upon it and maturing in a reasonably short time such as 3 months, is the safest security in the world and the most convenient, and for that reason it is the cheapest way in the world of raising money.

Mr. KENNEY. It is very interesting that the merchants of England had their exclusive privilege of issuing bills of exchange challenged at an early date. This right and privilege was invaded, but the merchants met the challenge. In an action brought by a merchant stranger, that is, a person not a merchant, the law merchant under which the issuance of the bill of exchange was reserved to merchants was incorporated into the common law in the Court of King's Bench in the year 1613, and I would like, Mr. Chairman, to insert in the RECORD at this point the decision in that case, Oaste v. Taylor (3 Croke's Jacobus, 306).

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The decision referred to is as follows:

In the Court of Kings Bench, 1613. Oaste v. Taylor (3 Croke's Jacobus, 306). Assumpsit, by David Oaste, a merchant stranger, against William Taylor, a merchant; for that whereas by the custom of London between merchants trafficking from London into the parts beyond the seas, if any merchant commorant in London, and trafficking beyond seas, direct his bill of exchange bona fide, and without covin, to another merchant commorant beyond the seas, and upon such a merchant's accepting a bill, and subscribing it according to the use of merchants, it hath the force of a promise, to compel him to pay it at the day appointed by the bill; and allegeth in fact, that William Kenton, being a merchant trafficking betwixt London, and Middleburgh beyond the seas, and commorant in London, directed his bill of exchange to the defendant commorant in Middleburgh, and trafficking between London and Middleburgh, requiring him to pay 345 pounds Flemish, at the usance of 4 months, to the plaintiff, being a merchant: and that the defendant accepted thereof, secundum sum mercatorem, and subscribed it, and had not paid it. Whereupon—After verdict, upon non assumpsit pleaded, and found for the plaintiff, it was moved in arrest of judgment, because the defendant is not averred to be a merchant at the time the bill accepted. * * *

The acceptance of a bill of exchange by the law merchant to a promise to pay it; but it must be stated that the drawer was a merchant at the time he accepted it. * * * Marginal note.

Mr. KENNEY. Evidently there was an astute lawyer for the defense, because he let it proceed to judgment. The plaintiff in the case did not plead that the defendant was a merchant at the time he accepted the bill, and the court held that a material allegation had not been pleaded as required by the common law and granted a motion in arrest of judgment. The effect of the decision was that a merchant stranger could not issue or create a bill of exchange which right was given only to merchants—the producers of wealth.

Now, the Bank of England serves well its country's business, industry, and commerce. It does so through the bill of exchange, and exchequer bonds have added strength to its portfolios. But the right of the merchant has been invaded not only here but in England. The British Government accepted the advice of one of its economists who upheld the instrument of the bill of exchange, so much so that he said to the Government, "Why do you not compete with the merchants and issue treasury bills on the same basis that the merchants issue them?" The Government acceded, contrary to the principles of good, old-fashioned banking, I believe, and began to issue treasury bills or Government bills of exchange for the banks to deal in at the expense of the merchants, for the greater the drain upon the bank by the Government the less there was for the accommodation of the merchant.

Our merchants and our business have suffered here, but more so, by diverting our banks' resources from trade to other channels. Back in 1927 and 1928 the banks seemed to prefer to lend for speculative purposes rather than to business and trade.

Our banks loaned inordinate amounts on securities under the new-fashioned banking. Of course, this had to be to some extent at least, at the expense of business. The merchant, like others, began to look for profits from stock-market operations and borrowed from the banks for this purpose, curtailing the supply of credit for his business. Many merchants began to lose interest in their businesses. Business activity was subsiding and unemployment was reaching serious proportions if not curbed. In 1928 there were 4,000,000 unemployed. Business men, many of them, allowed a decline in their particular fields without much resistance and went into the stock market and borrowed from the banks for their operations, diverting money from business to speculation, which finally brought about the collapse.

Oh, the banks overstepped the line and lent on so many things and in so many ways that the survivors of them find themselves, like the Government, in a variety of businesses; and I think some of the bankers will agree after the great headaches they have had and after the experiences they have gone through, that if they had limited their loans to industry, commerce, and agriculture and sound Government securities and had engaged in fewer speculative loans, they and their banks would be in a much healthier condition.

Is it going to improve the situation to bring in the Government to partake of the control? At most, it seems an artificial, an arbitrary device. It is true that the new control can put a clamp on speculation, perhaps. It can say to the stock brokers that they will have to pay 10 percent call and that sort of thing and, of course, the control may be exercising good judgment or it may not; but in any case such a control does not seem to me to be natural. With the banking system away from the Government and out of the hands of capitalists and under the management of bankers in the true sense of the word, the natural law will prevail.

So I hope that the consideration of our banking problem will not be dismissed upon the passage of this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 more minutes.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe the problem requires greater study on the part of this Congress, and not only on the part of the Congress but on the part of commerce, industry, and agriculture. I do not know in detail what went on in the committee room, but I have thumbed the pages of the hearings and from the personnel that appeared I would conclude that there were no special representatives of business who appeared before the committee, and it is not apparent whether business men have ever studied the banking problem sufficiently or have had it done for them by somebody else. To me it is a subject that the business of this country ought to go into and sift thoroughly. Of course, we had representatives of the Government at the hearings and, naturally, we had the bankers there; and, mind you, I am not blaming the bankers. There is, however, a question in my mind as to whether we should not build up a different system, a central banking system, a system that would aid business and at the same time prove of stable benefit. Under our system as it has heretofore existed the country has suffered and many a banker in my State was sick abed, and not only that, I know some of them who actually gave up their lives because of the great collapse. So I hope this study will go on to work out a situation where we can finally apply the rules of natural law in our banking system.

It should not be necessary for the Government to come in and control the situation. We ought to have worked out a system apart from any such influence that will by its very nature serve our people but not control our business.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEY. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the gentleman think a central bank should be used for the purpose of raising money to pay the Government debts?

Mr. KENNEY. No, sir; I do not.

It is the function of the Government to lend its guarantee under certain conditions in time of stress, but the Government should not encroach upon business either directly or indirectly through the banks, and I am still hopeful that the day will come when we adopt a banking system that will function naturally without artificial interference, and if we do, it is my view that we shall only go back to old-fashioned banking. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide for the sound, effective, and uninterrupted operation of the banking system, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ATTORNEY FEES AND EXPENSES IN FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF DETROIT, MICH.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency to me relating to bank receivers and letters from attorneys in Detroit. It was found that that was too long under the rule, and I, therefore, ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and only include the letter from the Comptroller.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter which I recently received from the Comptroller of the Currency, Hon. J. F. T. O'Connor:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 17, 1935.

Hon. PRENTISS M. BROWN,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BROWN: I know that you were glad to learn from my letter of April 12 that the liquidation of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce of Detroit has been conducted at a profit to the depositors, in that the income from the bank's assets while in the hands of the conservator and the receiver has exceeded all liquidation expense by approximately one and a half million dollars. In submitting the following information concerning the liquidation of the First National Bank of Detroit, I am pleased to advise you that this receivership also is operating at a profit to the depositors and that the income received during the liquidation has exceeded the expense of liquidation by approximately $6,000,000.

The liabilities of the First National Bank of Detroit to its depositors and other creditors exceeded $415,000,000 at suspension. The receiver has collected as of December 31, 1934, from interest, premiums, and rents $9,973,109.79, a net profit from operations of approximately $6,000,000. The total amount collected from all sources as of that date was $199,855,879.61, and the total expense of liquidation, including the expense of the conservator, was $3,975,319.06. All amounts received from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are eliminated from this computation. It thus appears that the total expense of liquidation as of December 31, 1934, was less than 1 percent of the deposit liability and less than 2 percent of the total cash collected.

The report of examination of this bank as of December 30, 1932, just prior to suspension, reflects a total annual pay roll of $4,211,439.76 covering 2,108 officers and employees. Included in this sum was $262,000 representing the total annual salaries of the president, cashier, and 18 vice presidents. As of April 15, 1935, the receiver had 654 employees, a reduction of 68.98 percent, with a total annual pay roll, including the salary of the receiver, of $1,094,070, a reduction of 74.02 percent. This does not include 62 real-estate caretakers and janitors temporarily employed on part time. I do not suggest that the receivership expenses can be compared with those of a going bank, but these figures do indicate the savings effected for depositors and other creditors.

Judge Robert S. Marx represents the Comptroller's Office in the liquidation of the First National Bank, and has as associates Hugh L. Nichols, Esq., Albert H. Morrill, Esq., and G. A. Ginter, Esq. Judge Marx employs, in connection with the legal work of this trust, Attorneys Zanone, Manley, Hugh C. Nichols, Schmidt, Runge, Kasfir, Kelley, Levi, Hogan, Harold Nichols, and Bachman, who also perform services for Judge Frank E. Wood, the attorney for the receiver of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce. All payments to these attorneys are met from the fees paid Judges Marx and Wood.

Judge Marx has not yet presented an itemized fee bill covering his services to this receivership. The services rendered are being performed under the fee agreement required of all attorneys representing receivers of insolvent national banks providing the fees for services shall be reasonable and subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, whose decision shall be final. Itemized fee bills are required describing in detail the services rendered, the time and amount involved, and the results obtained for the depositors and other creditors. When a bill is submitted it will be carefully reviewed under standards for the allowance of attorney fees built up in this office over a period of years and uniformly applied to all bills for legal services rendered the more than 1,500 national bank receivers now functioning throughout the United States.

The only payment that has been made to Judge Marx incident to the liquidation of this bank was an advance of $75,000 on account paid October 9, 1934. This advance was based upon the services rendered incident to the following items:

ITEM 1. SALE OF ASSETS TO NEW NATIONAL BANK OF DETROIT

Sale of assets valued at $104,588,000 to the National Bank of Detroit permitting the prompt payment of a dividend of approximately $135,000,000 to more than 700,000 depositors. The legal services included the formulation of the contract between the two banks; legal details in connection with a loan of $35,609,000 made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and presentation to the United States District Court at a public hearing for its approval.

ITEM 2. DIVIDEND DISTRIBUTION

Services rendered in this connection included the disposition of thousands of claims for set-off, alleged preferences and assignments involving a total amount in excess of $100,000,000.

ITEM 3. RECOVERY OF UNLAWFUL PREFERENCES

Prior to the appointment of a conservator transactions occurred between the First National Bank and a number of Michigan banks that were believed to have resulted in illegal preferences to the other banks, a violation of section 5242, United States Revised Statutes. Through the efforts of Judge Marx recoveries were made for the depositors and other creditors of the First National Bank, or it was protected against losses as follows:

First National Bank of Pontiac, Mich	$601,283.29
Peoples Wayne County Bank of Highland Park	504,423.25
Peoples Wayne County Bank of Dearborn	418,561.57
Peoples Wayne County Bank of Wyandotte	45,531.18
Peoples Wayne County Bank of Ecorse	70,165.30
Peoples Wayne County Bank of Hamtramck	252,964.64
Romulus State Bank, Romulus, Mich	25,000.00
E. Hill & Sons State Bank, Colan, Mich	45,105.03
Total	1,963,034.26

ITEM 4. RECOVERY OF APPROXIMATELY $500,000 FROM FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. AND LLOYDS INSURANCE AGENCY

Prior to the bank's suspension suit had been filed against these surety companies to recover large losses alleged to have been suffered by the American State Bank, subsequently taken over by the Peoples Wayne County Bank, later merged with the First National Bank. After having preliminary motions dismissed Judge Marx brought the case to issue, prepared the evidence to support 75 complicated cases of embezzlement, and after trial effected a settlement which resulted in a payment of $250,000 in cash to the bank receiver, a release of the salvage recovered from the embezzlers aggregating approximately $300,000, and a payment in excess of $45,000 by the receiver of Lloyds Insurance Agency plus an assignment of its claims against the reinsurers.

ITEM 5. RECOVERY OF CLAIMS AGAINST STANDARD ACCIDENT INSURANCE CO.

As a result of several months' work Judge Marx secured the payment of approximately $64,000 on account of a large number of claims against this bonding company and obtained collateral security in the amount of $590,000 par value and $400,000 market value, covering other claims asserted by the bank against this company.

ITEM 6. MORTGAGE FORECLOSURES

The First National Bank of Detroit held 57,000 separate mortgages at suspension aggregating more than $150,000,000 in value. Judge Marx's services were required incident thereto in connection with their assignment or pledge to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, sale to the new bank, foreclosure in advertisement and by chancery proceeding, exchange for Home Owners' Loan Corporation bonds, and set-off problems.

ITEM 7. RECEIVERSHIP OF DETROIT BANKERS CO.

This company held all of the stock of the First National Bank and many of the matters involving the bank were intertwined with the holding company. Included were the safe-deposit vaults of the bank and its numerous branches; the investment affiliate of the bank; the tax returns of the bank; the nominee corporation for the bank; and a number of other subsidiaries and affiliates. The holding company was indebted to the bank in the amount of approximately $4,000,000 and it was necessary that bankruptcy proceedings be instituted, one phase of which is now pending in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals.

ITEM 8. REAL-ESTATE LEASES

The breach by the conservator of a number of lease agreements to pay large rentals for many years in the future resulted in large contingent claims for damages. The total amount due under the leases aggregated $14,162,719.88 and the taxes totaled $4,330,011.48. As of October 9, 1934, the receivership, through Judge Marx's efforts was released from contingent liabilities aggregating several million dollars through settlements for nominal sums approved by the Comptroller.

ITEM 9. FIRST NATIONAL BANK BUILDING

Through negotiations with the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co., the holder of the mortgage on this building, Judge Marx obtained a reduction in interest on the mortgage from 5 percent to 4 percent for the life of the mortgage, resulting in an annual saving of approximately $40,000. A moratorium on any further principal payments for the next 3 years was also obtained. The board of tax assessors was induced by Judge Marx to reduce the assessed valuation by approximately $1,000,000. Thereafter a lease was negotiated and a supplemental tax arrangement formulated which has resulted in an additional saving to the receivership of at least $20,000 per annum.

ITEM 10. LAWSUITS

Prior to October 9, 1934, many lawsuits of almost every kind and description, involving many thousands of dollars, were filed involving this bank requiring the continuous presence in court of one or more of Judge Marx's associates. Outside judges were specially assigned for the purpose of hearing bank cases. For example, more than 50 bank cases were tried before Hon. Walter Lindley, of Chicago, sitting specially in Detroit. Practically all of these cases were won by the receivership.

ITEM 11. SAVINGS DEPOSITORS' LIEN CASES—AMOUNT INVOLVED—ALLEGED LIEN FOR $252,000,000

Certain savings depositors of the People's Wayne County Bank, merged with the First National Bank December 31, 1931, filed an action asserting that under Michigan law they had a lien on assets purchased by the State bank with their funds, and that the lien attaches to those assets now in the hands of the national-bank receiver. The matter was referred to a special master and later tried before the United States District Court, resulting in a judgment in favor of the receiver. Judge Marx was successful in securing a waiver of appeal, thus permitting further dividends to be paid.

Of course, the $75,000 advance does not constitute payment for all services incident to the above items plus other services rendered up to October 9, 1934, nor does it compensate for services rendered since that date, including stock-assessment collections totaling $5,569,860.22 made pursuant to the decision in Barbour v. Thomas (7 Fed. Supp. 271) and other major matters.

In addition to this advance of $75,000 made to Judge Marx, the following attorney fees have been paid for services rendered this trust:

Davis, Polk, Wardwell, Gardiner & Reed, 15 Broad Street, New York City	$252.16
Carton & Gault, Flint, Mich	53.00
Lightner, Hanley, Crawford & Dodd, Detroit, Mich	5,000.00
Mack, Wikoff & Ross, Chicago, Ill	3,000.00
Bryant, Lincoln, Miller & Bevan, Detroit, Mich	107.85
Best & Best, Riverside, Calif	150.00
	8,563.01

The records of this bank indicate that approximately $500,000 was expended for attorney services during 1931 and 1932, the 2 years prior to suspension. General claims for legal services unpaid at suspension have been allowed Messrs. Lightner, Hanley, Crawford & Dodd of Detroit, Mich., in the amount of $16,840.55, and to Messrs. Edwards, O'Loughlin & George of New York City in the amount of $2,540.59.

The reasons for the designation of Judges Marx and Wood as attorneys for the two receivers of insolvent national banks of Detroit were outlined in my letter of April 12, discussing the situation at the Guardian National Bank of Commerce. The results so far obtained for the depositors and other creditors by these attorneys and their associates, and the reputation they have established before the bench and the bar in Detroit, fully justify the confidence placed in them by my predecessor. As statutory trustee for the depositors and other creditors, I consider that their services have been highly satisfactory.

In order to clear up the misunderstanding that national-bank receiverships are hedged with great secrecy, I desire to respectfully call your attention to the Comptroller's annual report, which contains full information under the following headings:

All collections by receivers, collection and offsets allowed; collections from stock assessments; amounts borrowed from the R. F. C.; dividends paid by receivers to secured and unsecured creditors; distributions by conservators, payments to secured and preferred creditors; offsets allowed and settled; disbursements for protection of assets; receivers' salaries, legal and other expenses; conservators' salaries, legal and other expenses; a table showing the status, progress, and results of liquidation of all national banks placed in hands of receivers from the date of the first national bank failure in 1865 to October 31, last, the end of the fiscal year in the Comptroller's office; separate tables giving dates of appointment of receivers; capital at date of organization and at date of failure; dividends paid while solvent; total deposits, bills payable and rediscounts at date of failure; also tables showing assets at date of failure, additional assets acquired subsequent to failure; offsets allowed; disposition of all collections and dividends paid to creditors of all insolvent national banks, this information being given in detail as to each national bank.

In addition to this each receiver makes a quarterly report, showing:

Assets: Assets at date of suspension (book value as reported in receiver's first report); additional assets acquired since suspension (book value); stock assessments; total assets to be accounted for—cash collected from assets; cash collected from additional assets; cash collected from stock assessment; total cash collected from assets and stock assessment; offsets allowed on assets; losses charged off on assets and on stock assessment; remaining assets, consisting of uncollected assets, uncollected additional assets, and uncollected stock assessment; a recapitulation of remaining assets—book and estimated values—showing uncollected assets, uncollected additional assets, uncollected stock assessment, and a total of the remaining assets.

Liabilities: Secured liabilities at date of suspension; unsecured liabilities at date of suspension, additional liabilities established, total liabilities this date; secured and preferred liabilities paid in cash (paid by conservator); unsecured liabilities offset; unsecured liabilities for which receiver's certificates have been issued; unpaid secured liabilities (both proved and unproved), unsecured liabilities not paid or proved, total liabilities accounted for.

Collections and disbursements: Collections from all sources, showing cash collected from assets and stock assessment; cash collected from interest, premium, and rents; cash collected by receiver, and held as trustee for owners; Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans received (loan to conservator); total collections to be accounted for; disbursements of every character, showing secured and preferred liabilities paid (including dividends) (paid by conservator); collateral account (collections held by secured creditors and not yet applied); advances in protection of assets (taxes, insurance, etc.); expenses of receivership (expenses and advances by conservator); dividends paid to unsecured creditors (paid by conservator); Reconstruction Finance Corportion loans repaid; cash in hands of receiver and comptroller; and total collections accounted for.

And this report is posted in the bank for the information of the depositors and creditors, and the general public.

The great solicitude of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency for the depositors of the two insolvent national banks at Detroit, the largest ever liquidated by the Comptroller, is evidenced by the loans this office has secured from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. A total of $139,940,000 was borrowed by the conservator and the receiver of the First National Bank to permit the payment to depositors and creditors of dividends totaling 70 percent and a total of $28,891,200 was borrowed by the conservator and the receiver of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce, resulting in dividends to its depositors and creditors totaling 68 percent. Arrangements are now being perfected for an additional loan of approximately $7,000,000 incident to the liquidation of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce which will permit another payment of 19 percent, making total dividends of 87 percent paid that bank's depositors and creditors. As you know, certain larger depositors of these two banks have made possible the payment in full of all depositors of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce with deposit balances at suspension of $1,000 or less and all depositors of the First National Bank with deposit balances at suspension of $300 or less. These payments of 100 percent could not have been made except through the splendid cooperation with this office of these unselfish large depositors who permitted small depositors to be paid in full out of their own dividends. The city of Detroit is to be congratulated in having such public-spirited citizens and I wish to express my appreciation to all the individuals and interests that contributed to the plan and particularly to their committees which gave such splendid assistance to this office.

May I thank you again for your courtesy in affording me this opportunity to deny the rumors concerning the large attorney fees that have been paid in connection with the liquidation of the two insolvent national banks at Detroit and for your willingness to assist in every way possible to insure that the depositors will obtain a maximum recovery from the bank's assets? I shall appreciate receiving your reaction to the facts stated in this letter.

A similar letter is being sent to Congressman JESSE P. WOLCOTT, and I am releasing this letter to the press.

Sincerely yours,

J. F. T. O'CONNOR,
Comptroller of the Currency.

PRELIMINARY OUTLINE OF AN ECONOMIC SYSTEM FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. DELGADO. Mr. Speaker, the Commonwealth Government of the Philippines is about to be organized. The trade relations between the Philippines and this country are becoming of more importance. I take it that each and every Member of this House and the Senate has a sort of a Filipino file wherein they deposit data relating to America and the Philippine Islands.

I have a copy of an address delivered by the president of the National Development Co., which contains very valuable data concerning the future trade relations between America and the Philippine Islands. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks so that I may have that address printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Delegate from the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELGADO. Mr. Speaker, I assume that each Member of the House and Senate has what might be called a Filipino file in which is deposited information relating to the Philippine Islands.

The time is rapidly approaching when the new Commonwealth will be established for a period of 10 years.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following extracts from an address delivered by Mr. Joaquin M. Elizalde, president of the Philippine National Development Co., in the commencement exercises of the Jose Rizal College in Manila, P. I., March 27, 1935:

It is an undeniable fact that the most important problem confronting our nation is that which pertains to economics. As graduates of a business college, you are expected to lead in this particular field. I shall, therefore, with your indulgence, proceed to outline what, in my opinion, is an essential problem that we must meet squarely: What economic system should the Philippines adopt?

To survive, under the pressure of modern international competition, every country has to work out an economic system of its own, and adapt it to its requirements, individual characteristics, customs, mode of living, national resources, wealth, physical strength, climate, natural resources, etc. But the success of any particular system of economy will depend upon the "purposeful selection between alternative application of resources", as Wicksteed confirms.

There are various basic forms of economy from which nations are gradually deriving their own individual systems. The three most common forms are the following:

The highly industrialized system as developed by Great Britain, United States, Japan, Germany, and others.

The agricultural and raw-material producing system such as that developed in India, Java, South Africa, and in other colonies and possessions.

The semi-industrial and agricultural which is characteristic of various smaller countries, particularly in Europe. Of these, Spain is a typical example. It produces most, if not all, its requirements for farm products. At the same time, by a judicious protective tariff system, the country manufacturers, through smaller industries, the bulk of its requirements for finished goods, with the exception of heavy machinery, automobiles, and other patented industrial products. Its exports are of rather limited scope, consisting of oranges to England, wines to France, olive oil to the United States, and some mineral products. Against these, its imports are chiefly wheat, fuel oil, gasoline, and tobacco. The invisible items, mostly in the form of freight paid to foreign vessels for exports of goods are generally against Spain, but she has a counterbalancing item in the funds that are sent back to the country by Spanish subjects in South America, Mexico, and California. Under this form of economy, Spain can boast of a stable financial system, low cost of living, high wages, relatively no foreign debt, and stable currency as compared with other countries nowadays.

Which of these three systems would be adaptable here? Let us analyze them.

1. The highly industrialized system. This is out of the question. We lack financial resources, basic materials, such as coal, iron, mineral oil, and cheap power by electricity, all essentials for industrial development.

The country is underpopulated, and our people have not had much experience in industrial labor. Moreover, the purely industrial system is one of severe competition, and is today practically monopolized by strong and experienced nations that have been at it and in control of world's markets for years; that are strongly financed and aided by low cost of production; with facilities for distribution by large fleets of merchant ships, highly subsidized for that purpose.

Japan has only recently entered this sphere of intense industrialization, and is really suffering great hardships to maintain herself therein. Embargoes and quotas are imposed on her low-priced goods by countries jealous to maintain their long established markets.

It is perfectly obvious, therefore, that this system is not feasible here and must be discarded altogether.

2. The agricultural system, which serves as the framework of our present national economy, is, at best, unstable and not conducive to progress, economic or social. It is axiomatic that colonies and possessions are producers of raw materials exclusively. Some small independent nations, principally in South America, also Siam, produce raw materials, and all of them are economically dependent on industrial countries, which, by financial assistance, eventually dominate the economic structure of the producer nation.

Under this system it is utterly impossible to attain, at any time, economic freedom and sound, stable finances. Industrial nations and manufacturers have one fixed aim in view—to purchase their raw products at the lowest possible level. It is the consistent policy of such countries to drive prices down, as much as possible, with a double purpose: One, to increase their profits; the other, to place themselves in a position to compete with other nations.

Under these conditions the producer is given very little consideration and, as I have said before, is always at the mercy of the industrial country.

Industrialists, besides, are always trying to replace high-priced raw materials for cheaper ones, and maintain research organizations for this purpose. Most industrial countries are today working on the production of synthetic rubber. If this is ever successful, all rubber-producing countries, such as the Straits Settlements, South America, and Java, will suffer, and their large investments may get to the point of becoming worthless some day. The question is, How can they prevent it?

One reason why we should not remain stagnant within the agricultural system is this: Because of our climatic and soil conditions we can raise tropical products only, materials of high competitive range. The same are produced in many other tropical countries: Coconuts in the Straits, Java, India, Borneo, Celebes, etc.; sugar in Java, India, Formosa; hemp in Sumatra; timber in Borneo; rice in Indo-China; jute in India; rubber in the Straits, Java, and Brazil; tobacco in Turkey, Brazil, and Sumatra.

It must be taken into consideration that the producers of all these commodities—which are, and will more and more become, our most bitter competitors—are mostly countries of extremely low standards of living; countries which have not emerged from the "coolie" class, with wages between 10 and 20 centavos per day, with no limitation of hours for work, nor labor-protection laws, modern sanitation, or other requirements that give the laborer a respectable form of life but which, on the other hand, entails bigger expenses for the farmer and, consequently, higher costs of production.

It is then clear, that if we would compete with any degree of success in the world's markets with the aforementioned countries, we are doomed to discard rapidly our present standard of civilization and descend as quickly to that of the "coolie", as in Formosa, Singapore, Java, and India.

Even if a strong and economical government could provide for low taxes and give facilities, such as lower freight rates and farm financing, they would not be sufficient to allow us to compete with low-cost producing nations. Furthermore, Government assistance would become more and more difficult, as poverty would gradually undermine it.

I think, therefore, that it is to our advantage to emerge from this agricultural system, as soon as possible; before it is too late; before our finances and our credit fall so low that we shall have no alternative other than to adapt ourselves to the standards of the raw-material producing countries.

The theory is advanced that we should lower our standard of living, as a means of adjusting our economic life to existing conditions. But who wishes to see his country jump backward? Is it fair to impose on our people a standard of living that would push them down to the level of work animals? I believe that such a change imposes grave responsibilities upon those sponsoring and undertaking it, for it will unquestionably bring in its wake social unrest and violent protest from the direct sufferers. We have developed a mode of living that demands modern sanitation, public schools, good roads, efficient social service; and doing away with them now, or even curtailing such facilities for decent living would be unthinkable. No people would knowingly inflict misery upon themselves.

3. The third is the semiagricultural and industrial, which would involve the continuation of our present agricultural system, with limitations, plus the development of small industries to produce goods for local consumption. To insure success and a practical modus vivendi with immediate results, without sudden collapse of our finances, it is of primary importance to maintain, as much as possible, trade with the United States with preferential and reciprocal advantages.

It is possible that, by negotiations, the United States would consent to accept, in limited amounts, sugar, coconut oil, tobacco products, which are almost totally dependent on the American market. The Philippine government may endeavor to obtain, also, preferential arrangements in limited quantities for its goods that are partly dependent on the American market; among them may be included those manufactured here from our own raw materials, such as rope from hemp, coconut products, lumber, and embroideries.

All these negotiations or bargaining could be made possible by offering in exchange continued preferential trade in this country for American products which have now an established market in these Islands.

In relation to the exports of American goods to the Philippine Islands, it may be said that although their total value is not as large as the United States exports to some countries, I fully believe that American exporters are in a position to make better profits on the goods they ship to the Philippines than on those exported to other more competitive markets, where American commodities compete on an even basis against those manufactured by Japan, Great Britain, Germany, and others.

I venture to say that even in this depression American goods exported to the Philippine Islands are still sold on a profitable basis. This is probably not the case with merchandise exported to South America, China, Canada, and so forth.

Fundamentally, we shall have difficulty to sell to any country more than what we buy from it. We must endeavor to reduce our imports from Japan to counteract the present big unfavorable trade balance, unless Japan should materially increase her purchases from us, which does not appear likely at present due to her difficulties in exporting her products. The only way to do this is to establish here small industries to produce the goods that we now buy from that country in great quantities.

The all-important item, therefore, to inject into our economy the desired stability, consists in the establishment and development, at the earliest possible date, of small industries to supply our home demand and consumption.

By such industrialization, and by producing the bulk of our own agricultural requirements, we could afford a reduction in exports, now counterbalancing imports, and still have a sound trade status.

As a preliminary task of industrialization, the National Development Co. is endeavoring to perform the work of research and promotion to encourage investors. Technical men in the Departments of Agriculture and Commerce are studying the adaptability of certain industries and the possibility for their development.

It is very important, however, at this time to point out that without reasonable tariff protection industrial development would be practically impossible. I am hopeful that our Government will soon see the necessity of protection by tariff legislation to foster industrial development in this country.

There are very few industries that can prosper with the present inadequate protection, and the very strong competition from countries trying to sell their goods, regardless of price or profit.

May I also point out that one of the most important problems that we have to face is the shortage of technicians in different lines of industry. Perhaps we have many engineers and other technical men, but, unfortunately, very few of them are specialists in any particular line. If in the past our Government had sent "pensionados" abroad to work in factories rather than to take postgraduate courses in universities, today we would find many more men prepared to undertake industrial development which we are now seeking. The training of a man even though he may have adequate academical preparation is very expensive in any industry and new factories cannot possibly be opened and placed in the hands of men without practical experience, however splendid their university training might be.

In the development of basic industries, such as gold mining, iron mining, etc., we find a depressing shortage of first-class technicians with business and executive ability, with technical and practical knowledge.

I strongly urge the establishment of an industrial bank. There is imperative need of a network of industrial credit organizations sufficiently liberal in their policies, in the extension of facilities, based on personal credit, business, and technical ability. Without such aid, without an adequate financing system of the sort, the contemplated establishment of small industries to reclaim the country from its present purely agricultural condition may be impossible.

The deeper we go into this question the more we appreciate the necessity of implanting the semi-industrial and agricultural system in this country as the one most adapted to our needs to save us from being entirely dependent upon the highly industrialized nations. The operation of this system, similar to that of Spain, would avoid the dangerous disproportions in trade balances, which when favorable to us threaten our production and exports, and when unfavorable, threatens us with general economic disaster.

It is not wise at this critical period, and with our present resources, to consider the immediate establishment of a completely independent currency system or any alteration in the relation of the peso with the dollar. Our connection with the dollar gives us a strong moral credit standing which is recognized by all the world.

In our particular case, the country enjoys a tremendous inflow of invisibles from the yearly expenditures of the United States Army and Navy, amounting to millions of dollars. When such a source of wealth disappears, with our change of political status, the country will have to get it from somewhere else to keep our general economic system working smoothly. But while we are favored by such item, on the other hand, there is an increasing drain of invisibles which we pay in freight on foreign steamers.

So far we are able to tide over the great discrepancies in our trade balances with Japan by drawing from the excess in our favor in our trade with the United States. But such an impossible situation cannot last forever, as we are beginning to learn much to our chagrin. It is certain that the day we lose our favorable trade with America, our unfavorable balance with Japan will have to be settled in some way. In the end, however, the balances against us will gradually become Philippine credits from Japan and we shall, therefore, become automatically a debtor nation to her, and suffer all the onerous consequences that such a situation entails. Our debts may grow in a few years to such a point that we may become absolutely dominated financially by that nation.

The law of trade balances must be obeyed. And again I submit that, for this country, a semi-industrial and agricultural system, with a government economically operated in relation to its income, with the resources of the State regulated and administered with minimum waste, and in the interest of the nation, would be precisely the system that would elevate the country from a state of economic subservience to the ideal position of self-sufficiency.

COTTON

Mr. DEAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House on the subject of cotton production and the maintenance of the processing tax.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEAR. Mr. Speaker, there are 2,200,000 cotton farmers in the South. There are 136,082 cotton farmers in the State of Louisiana, and 21,922 in the Eighth District of that State which I represent. Throughout the years they have been obliged to toil and sell the products of their labor in the open markets of this country and the world, and on the other hand were forced to purchase industrial goods in the protected market of the United States. The cotton farmers have wrestled with the problems of world surpluses, fluctuation of markets, climatic conditions, pests, and in my particular district with devastating floods. In 1932 they were forced to sell their cotton for as low as 4.6 cents per pound. At that time the change in the national administration brought relief and the average price received last fall was 12.6 cents per pound. The present administration in justice long denied these farmers has given them for the first time in the Nation's history what may be termed a "farmer's tariff" in the levying of a processing tax, the benefit of which goes to the farmers as an increase in the selling price of cotton.

At this time the cotton farmer is experiencing an attack, subtle and terrific, from the textile manufacturers in this country. The farmers are told by those opposing the farmer's tariff that the processing tax is destroying the textile industry of the United States; that it is raising the cost of goods to consumer; that the tax results in encouraging foreign countries to raise more cotton and consequently that we are losing our foreign market for raw American cotton. Just at the time when the cotton producer is given a ray of hope, it is blasted by this argument, the purpose of which is to destroy the processing tax and to force the cotton producer into his former position of selling his staple at a price below the cost of production. This is a matter of utmost concern to all; for, in short, it means a chance for the farmer to own his own home and to live on the one hand or virtual slavery on the other. Cotton production is the very heart of the South. Destroy the processing tax and you will lay a withering hand not only to agriculture, but to every enterprise in that section.

It is true that our exports of cotton have declined, but that is not the result of the processing tax, as contended by the spokesmen for the textile industry. Our exports generally have decreased. This is true of lumber and other products, both of agriculture and industry. There are many factors entering into the picture which prevent the foreign customers from purchasing American cotton. Involved in these are trade barriers and the question of unstabilized exchanges. In order for foreign countries to purchase our cotton, we must necessarily purchase goods from them. We cannot expect them to purchase our cotton unless we accord them an opportunity to obtain a trade balance with us by our purchasing from them. Before any country can purchase American cotton she must be enabled to obtain American dollars with which to make the purchases. Under the unstabilized conditions and trade policies throughout the world this is difficult at this time. The price of cotton is not a controlling factor in the purchase of cotton by the foreign countries. It must be remembered that the gold price of cotton on the 29th day of April was 8.05 cents per pound, which is even a substantial advance over the gold price for March. The crop of 1924–25 brought an average of 22.9 cents per pound and of that crop the foreign countries took 8,005,000 bales; the crop of 1927–28 brought an average of 20.2 cents per pound and of that crop the foreign countries took 7,540,000 bales; whereas the crop of 1932–33 brought an average price of 6.5 cents per pound the foreign countries took 8,419,000 bales. Our export trade in cotton has been affected by factors which have affected all of our export trade. The economic trends resulting from the World War, together with other considerations, have had their depressing effect on our cotton exports. It was not brought about by the processing tax. It must be borne in mind that the processing tax is not placed on cotton shipped to foreign countries. It is paid by the manufacturers in the United States. In order to protect our manufacturers in the matter of foreign trade, the equivalent of the processing tax is deducted from the goods they manufacture and ship abroad, and to protect them in our home markets the processing tax is added to all cotton goods imported into the United States to be sold in competition with American-made goods. The conditions complained of by the textile industry of the East have not arisen overnight. Though the processing tax was only recently imposed, nevertheless we find that in New England in 1921 there were 18,702,000 spindles, and in 1933 there were 10,810,000. Regardless of that, the spokesmen for the textile industry endeavor to make it appear that these conditions were brought about by the farmer's tariff.

Those agitating the campaign against the continuance of the tax argue that it materially raises the price of goods to the consumers. However, they are confused, and some contend the tax cannot be shifted to the consumer because textiles are manufactured in sharp competition with other commodities, such as rayon and other substitutes which carry no processing tax. Whereas, in order to frighten the consumer and to strengthen their cause, they also argue that the tax is passed on to the consumer and unreasonably raises the price.

What are the facts? The tax is so small that it really makes little difference in the price to the consumer. We will take a few typical examples: cotton sheet weighing 1.91 pounds, processing tax 7.6 cents per sheet; cotton work shirt weighing .89 pound, processing tax 3.4 cents per shirt; overalls weighing 2.06 pounds, processing tax 8.2 cents per pair; cotton unbleached muslin weighing .32 pound per yard, processing tax 1 cent per yard. A tax of 7 cents on 1 cotton sheet, of 3 cents on 1 work shirt, 8 cents on 1 pair of overalls, and 1 cent per yard on muslin is indeed small, and a negligible factor in the tax considerations.

The effort to destroy the benefits to the southern cotton farmers is not unexpected. In the beginning our able Secretary of Agriculture warned the American people that such an effort would be made to destroy the agricultural program, especially as it affects cotton. The prophecy has become a reality. Every effort is being made to remove the processing tax. It is suggested by some that it be paid out of the relief funds recently voted by Congress to aid the unemployed. That, of course, would mean that the tax would die with the exhaustion of the relief funds. It would be the deathknell of the processing tax, and finally the wrecking of the entire agricultural program. It has also been suggested that if any tax is paid that it should be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. If the farmers' tariff is to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, then, by the same logic, the tariff protecting the industries of this country which increases the price of goods sold to farmers should likewise be paid out of the United States Treasury.

To illustrate how the farmer pays his tribute for the protection of American industry, he pays a protective tariff of 2 cents per pound on soap, 4½ cents on every hoe that he buys, 4 cents per pound on every trace chain, 15 percent on the cost of leather lines, 2.59 cents per pound on his rope plow lines, 37 percent ad valorem on overalls, 45 percent on cotton shirts, an average of 24 cents per pair on shoes, an average of $1.06 on wool felt hats, and over 50 percent on the cost of a shotgun. In other words, on a pair of overalls selling for $1 the textile manufacturer receives in tariff protection 37 cents, on a shirt selling for $1 he receives tariff protection of 45 cents, while the "farmer's tariff" on the cotton in the shirt amounts to only 3 cents and on that in the overalls only 8 cents. Nevertheless the textile manufacturer, while retaining his protection and demanding more, would destroy the small tax which has been levied to assist the cotton farmer. If the farmer's tariff should be paid from the United States Treasury in aid of the textile industry, why not relieve the farmer and pay the protective tariff from the United States Treasury on the articles which he buys? Of course the proposition is preposterous.

This is the first administration that has ever done anything for the cotton farmers of the South. Statistics show that they have become poorer and poorer as the years went by. More and more of the cotton farmers lost their lands. Statistics show that many thousand cotton farmers throughout the belt lost their homes and became tenant farmers during the 10-year period 1920–30. They were promised relief, but nothing was done. When President Roosevelt was inaugurated he went into action. He put cash into the pockets of our farmers in contrast to only promises heretofore received. A cotton farmer received in 1932 an average of $37.50 for a bale of cotton and seed and for the same bale and seed in 1934 he received the sum of $80. To illustrate the benefit received by cotton farmers of Louisiana at the hands of President Roosevelt and his Secretary of Agriculture, I wish to call attention to the following authentic information furnished by the cotton section of the Department of Agriculture:

Value of cotton crop and rental and benefit payments in Louisiana, 1932, 1933, and 1934

This tells the story of the cotton farmer. Briefly, the amount of money each parish in my district received for last year's crop over the amount received for the crop of 1932–33 is as follows: Avoyelles, $887,634; Grant, $298,338; La Salle, $37,873; Natchitoches, $1,449,553; Rapides, $1,051,224; Sabine, $287,592; Vernon, $157,312; Winn, $152,836; a combined total of $4,322,362 for the Eighth District. The farmers of the entire State of Louisiana received for their last crop $22,179,271 more than they received for the 1932 crop.

We in Louisiana—and in my opinion the thinking people of the Nation—appreciate the tremendous burden placed upon the leadership of the Democratic Party in bringing about adjustment in American life made necessary by the misrule of 12 years of Republican administration. We all know that in this gigantic readjustment some mistakes will be made and that apparent injustices will appear in the program. That is true in all large undertakings. Those of us supporting the present administration have an abiding faith in our Chief Executive and a sympathetic cooperation in aiding and assisting him in restoring confidence to this country, and especially in his effort to rehabilitate the great agricultural sections of the Nation. The President's sympathies and efforts encompass the welfare of all the people of our Nation, and the textile industry should join hands with him in his desire to improve the condition of the farmers of the South. They should realize that their best domestic markets are in the agricultural sections of this country. If the processing tax is destroyed it means the destruction of the purchasing power of the farmers of the South, and likewise the destruction of the domestic market for the goods of the industrial sections. There is no place in this program for partisan politics or sectionalism, and efforts of those to inject the same into the consideration of this question is against the best interest of the Nation as a whole. The cotton farmers of the South are as much a part of labor as the arm is a part of the body, and if this Nation is to prosper I warn the industrial sections not to bleed white the labor of the South. The farmers of Louisiana, and especially those of my congressional district, can rest assured that the attacks being made on the agricultural program will be challenged at every opportunity. This administration will continue its efforts to better the conditions of the farmer, and it is my opinion that the processing tax will not be removed, but, on the other hand, that further assistance will be given to them whereby they will be enabled to maintain themselves and their families consistent with American standards and American life.

The farmers of the State of Louisiana, with gratitude in their hearts for what a great President has already done for them, will follow him in confidence in the future. Under his leadership the farmers of my district can see the light of the dawn on the horizon of a new day for agriculture and will loyally follow his administration into the full light of that new day of rehabilitation and recovery, not only for the farmers but for the people of a grateful nation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a newspaper article to which I referred earlier in the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED

Bills and joint resolutions of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 158. An act authorizing the President to present a medal in the name of Congress to Johannes F. Jensen; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 159. An act to amend the provision in the act approved March 3, 1931, governing the computation of commissioned service of Naval Academy graduates who have been retired for age or service ineligibility for promotion; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 373. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment on the claim of Robert A. Watson; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 376. An act to facilitate the control of soil erosion and/or flood damage originating upon lands within the exterior boundaries of the Uinta and Wasatch National Forests, Utah; to the Committee on Agriculture.

S. 377. An act to grant to the Utah Gilsonite Co. the right to use a water well on certain public lands in Utah; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 616. An act authorizing the removal of rock from the submarine and destroyer base reservation at Astoria (Tongue Point), Oreg.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 918. An act to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the Union Iron Works; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 985. An act for the relief of Hudson Bros., of Norfolk, Va.; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1030. An act for the relief of the Mutual Savings & Loan Association, Wilmington, Del.; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1206. An act authorizing the transfer of certain lands near Vallejo, Calif., from the United States Housing Corporation to the Navy Department for naval purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 1214. An act for the relief of Oliver B. Huston, Anne Huston, Jane Huston, and Harriet Huston; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1277. An act to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code by conferring on district courts additional jurisdiction of bills of interpleader; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1379. An act to amend section 103 of the Code of Criminal Procedure for the Canal Zone and section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the Canal Zone; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 1380. An act to regulate the defense of alibi in criminal cases; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1426. An act providing for the appointment of Harry T. Herring, formerly a lieutenant colonel in the United States Army, as a lieutenant colonel in the United States Army and his retirement in that grade; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1470. An act to provide a preliminary examination of Spokane River and its tributaries in the State of Idaho, with a view to the control of their floods; to the Committee on Flood Control.

S. 1495. An act authorizing the President to order Donald O. Miller before a retiring board for a hearing of his case and upon the findings of such board determine whether or not he be placed on the retired list with the rank and pay held by him at the time of his separation; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1497. An act to authorize the appointment of First Lt. Claude W. Shelton, retired, to the grade of captain, retired, in the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1505. An act for the relief of William Edward Tidwell; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1626. An act for the refunding of certain countervailing customs duties collected upon logs imported from British Columbia; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1824. An act for the relief of Abraham Green; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2131. An act to provide for the establishment of the Big Bend National Park in the State of Texas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 2185. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to accept the cession by the State of Oregon of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Crater Lake National Park, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 2193. An act to provide for the construction, extension, and improvement of public-school buildings in Duchesne County, Utah; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 2215. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection and publication of statistics of tobacco by the Department of Agriculture", approved January 14, 1929, as amended; to the Committee on Agriculture.

S. 2225. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Western Union Telegraph Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2276. An act to authorize participation by the United States in the Interparliamentary Union; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 2292. An act for the relief of Emanuel Wallin; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 2298. An act for the relief of Sallie S. Twilley; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2312. An act for the relief of the Western Construction Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2356. An act to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes", approved August 25, 1919, as amended by act of March 6, 1920; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 2407. An act for the relief of Gordon McGee; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2453. An act to amend section 80 of chapter 9 of an act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. J. Res. 89. Joint resolution directing the Comptroller General to readjust the account between the United States and the State of Vermont; to the Committee on War Claims.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 6223. An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 1488. An act for the relief of Rose Burke;

H. R. 1565. An act for the relief of Frank R. Carpenter, alias Frank R. Carvin;

H. R. 2464. An act for the relief of C. H. Hoogendorn;

H. R. 2473. An act for the relief of William L. Jenkins;

H. R. 3098. An act for the relief of Bertha Ingmire;

H. R. 3275. An act for the relief of Fred L. Seufert;

H. R. 3370. An act for the relief of Carrie K. Currie, doing business as Atmore Milling & Elevator Co.;

H. R. 3787. An act for the relief of Robert D. Hutchinson;

H. R. 3911. An act for the relief of Sarah J. Hitchcock;

H. R. 5133. An act for the relief of Nellie Oliver;

H. R. 6084. An act to authorize the city of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not to exceed $1,000,000 for the purpose of acquiring the electric light and power, water, and telephone properties of the Citizens' Light, Power & Water Co., and to finance and operate the same, and validating the preliminary proceedings with respect thereto, and for other purposes;

H. R. 6223. An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 7132. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce to exchange a portion of the naval station and a portion of the lighthouse reservation at Key West, Fla.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.), the House adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, May 4, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

(Saturday, May 4, 10 a. m.)

Will continue hearings on the bill (H. R. 7521) pertaining to merchant marine subsidy.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. GILCHRIST: Committee on Agriculture. H. R. 2066. A bill to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness at a reduced rate of interest by establishing an efficient credit system, through the use of the Farm Credit Administration, the Federal Reserve Banking System, and creating a Board of Agriculture to supervise the same; without amendment (Rept. No. 819). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah: Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. H. R. 6773. A bill to deepen the irrigation channel between Clear Lake and Lost River, in the State of California, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 820). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SWEENEY: Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. H. R. 5723. A bill to give certain railway postal clerks the same time credits for promotion purposes as were given others who were promoted on July 1, when automatic promotions were restored; without amendment (Rept. No. 821). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROMJUE: Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. H. R. 5596. A bill granting equipment allowance to third-class postmasters; without amendment (Rept. No. 822). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Under clause 2 of rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5151) granting a pension to Rebecca Patterson; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 2997) granting a pension to Harriett Ware; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 2994) granting a pension to Adah C. Seed; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DIMOND: A bill (H. R. 7889) for the relief of Werner Ohls; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MEAD: A bill (H. R. 7890) for the relief of William Arthur Elmore; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SNYDER: A bill (H. R. 7891) granting an increase of pension to Ella N. Herwick; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WELCH: A bill (H. R. 7892) for the relief of Ada E. Sivley and George C. Sivley; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

8226. By Mr. CARTER of California: Assembly Joint Resolution No. 38, State of California, memorializing the President and Congress to enact House Joint Resolution No. 143, authorizing the Distinguished Service Medals to Tony Siminoff, Oliver F. Rominger, and Robert E. Beck, veterans of the Philippine Insurrection; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

8227. By Mr. FORD of California: Memorial of the California State Assembly, favoring House bill 2772, declaring the 9th day of September, California's Admission Day, a legal holiday for all officers and employees of the United States whose headquarters are in California; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8228. By Mr. GOODWIN: Petition of the Dairymen's League, Bloomingburg, Sullivan County, N. Y., opposing the passage of the Eastman bill (S. 1629); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8229. By Mr. KENNEY: Petition of the Board of Social Service of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Newark, endorsing the Pettengill bill (H. R. 6472); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8230. Also, petition of Columbia Council, No. 8, of New Jersey, representing the Sons and Daughters of Liberty, urging upon Congress favorable consideration and immediate passage of House bill 5921; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

8231. By Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts: Memorials of the General Court of Massachusetts, relative to protection of American industry and employees from foreign competition and requesting the President to exercise certain powers under the National Industrial Recovery Act for the benefit of the cotton textile industry; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8232. By Mr. PFEIFER: Petition of Lea & Perrins, Inc., New York, concerning bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act (H. R. 7713); to the Committee on Agriculture.

8233. By Mr. RUDD: Petition of War Veterans and Sons' Association, John Martin, secretary, room 13, Borough Hall, Brooklyn, N. Y., concerning the passage of House bill 5541; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8234. By Mr. TRUAX: Petition of Cleveland Wire Cloth & Manufacturing Co., Cleveland, Ohio, by their president, A. L. Crone, urging a continuance of the excise tax on foreign copper of 4 cents per pound being a part of revenue bill, 1932, which automatically expires in June of this year unless renewed by Congress; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8235. Also, petition of the Toledo Women's Trade Union League, Toledo, Ohio, by their secretary, Margaret Brangan, urging support of the Wagner labor disputes bill, as they believe it will mean a strengthening of section 7a by providing more adequate enforcement, the outlawing of company unions, and the fulfillment of the great promise of the new deal to labor of the right to organize and bargain collectively; and favoring the reenactment of the National Recovery Act; to the Committee on Labor.

8236. Also, petition of the Howland Women's Nonpartisan Club, Howland, Ohio, by their secretary, Olive E. McBride, urging support of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8237. Also, petition of the Great Lakes Regional Advisory Board, Cleveland, Ohio, by Frank H. Baer, general secretary, opposing Government ownership and operation of railroads and any tendency thereto, as Government ownership and operation of railroads in the United States would inevitably introduce political influences into rate making, employment, service, and construction, and abandonment of facilities regardless of adequacy, efficiency, and economy; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8238. Also, petition of members of the Blind Post, No. 5, D. V. U. S., by Harold J. Distelzewig, commander, asking support of House bill 5055, by Congressman DOCKWEILER, as only 9 of the 40 blind veterans in their post receive pensions and the facility is put to great expense to care for them; to the Committee on Pensions.

8239. By Mr. WELCH: Assembly Joint Resolution No. 51 of the California State Legislature, relative to memorializing the President and the Congress to enact legislation (H. R. 2772) declaring Admission Day a holiday for all officers and employees of the United States whose headquarters are in California; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

8240. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the Faust Post, No. 281, American Legion; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8241. Also, petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8242. Also, petition of the Women's Missionary Society of the First Methodist Church South, of Lexington, Ky.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

8243. Also, petition of the American Cotton Manufactures Association, of Charlotte, N. C.; to the Committee on Agriculture.

8244. Also, petition of the Common Council of the city of Delaware, Ohio; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8245. Also, petition of the Journeymen Tailors Union of America, Local No. 1, New York City; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8246. By Mr. BUCKBEE: Petition of the members of Fred Bennitt Camp, No. 3, United Spanish War Veterans, Pontiac, Ill., urging Congress to pass House bill 6995 to restore the Spanish War veterans' pensions; to the Committee on Pensions.

8247. By Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota: Petition of Arthur N. Barnard, president, and K. G. A. Springer, secretary, of the Civic and Commerce Association of Fergus Falls, Otter Tail County, Minn., praying for the passage of House bill 3263, the so-called "Pettengill bill"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8248. Also, petition of L. Jensen, president, and Edward D. Rydeen, secretary-manager, of the board of directors of the Cooperative Creamery Association, of Clearbrook, Minn., praying for the maintenance of the 1930 tariff structure as applied to dairy products; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8249. Also, petition of the Ralph Gracie Post, No. 14, of the American Legion of Bemidji, of Beltrami County, Minn., praying for opposition and negative action of Congress to the proposed setting off of the private lands along east and north shores of Red Lake in Beltrami County, Minn., and adding them to the Red Lake Indian Reservation; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

8251. By Mr. McCORMACK: Resolution of the Massachusetts Legislature, memorializing Congress in favor of requesting the President of the United States to exercise certain powers under the National Industrial Recovery Act for the benefit of the cotton-textile industry; to the Committee on Appropriations.

8252. Also, resolution of the Massachusetts Legislature, relative to protection of American industry and employees from foreign competition; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, we pray in the name of Him, whose face was marred, whose hands were pierced, and who denied Himself even unto death. We praise Thee, for He sings the deathless song of the immortal soul. Thou who art our Father, lift us to the gleaming hilltops of spiritual life and power. In Thee life is made worthy when we take the cup which Thou hast forever filled. Holy Spirit, urge us to altruistic planning, noble thinking, and generous doing. We pray that these may work through us in the wasted places of humanity. Grant that our ambition may be to gain distinction through deeds and to make it increasingly known that we are clean hearted, clean handed, and clean tongued; thus we shall ascend into the holy hill where dwell the good and the nobly great. In the name of our Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2265. An act extending the benefits of the Emergency Officers' Retirement Act of May 24, 1928, to provisional officers of the Regular Establishment who served during the World War;

S. J. Res. 117. Joint resolution to provide for the reappointment of Frederic A. Delano as a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; and

S. J. Res. 118. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD

Mr. DUFFY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like unanimous consent to correct the RECORD. As I am reported in reply to a question asked on yesterday by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], the answer would convey the idea that I had been denied the right to print the speech of Mr. Vanderlip. I did not intend to convey any such meaning by my answer, but what I did intend to convey was that I could not procure the notes or manuscript of the speech of Mr. Vanderlip. If I had them I would be glad to offer them for printing in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

THE PRAYER OF A COWARD

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the soldiers of the World War, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD against the return of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll to the United States of America.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the newspapers of recent date have been heralding the fact that Grover Cleveland Bergdoll has sent his wife and children to the United States of America as his personal emissaries to defend his right to return to what he says is the country of his choice; to the country where he desires to rear his children.

Mr. Speaker, when the sons of the mothers of this Nation marched to foreign fields in defense of their country in 1917 they left mothers behind whose eyes were dampened with the tears of patriotism and whose hearts were laden with the prayers that only a mother can know, and while the mothers of our boys—and I was a soldier in that war—readily yielded to the call of arms in the matter of giving their sons for the cause, the wealthy mother of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, who lives in Philadelphia, Pa., became an accessory in the cowardly thwarting of the Government's right to demand that her son march side by side with other American patriots in defending America's integrity against Germanic autocracy. The mother of this traitor is today enjoying the comforts afforded by this land of liberty and is able to visit her son at liberty in his paradise of cowardice; the country that is really his by choice and devotion, while thousands upon thousands of other mothers in this land have only the memory of a loving son whose body now rests beneath the sod. No such sympathy should move the officials of this Nation in the matter of amnesty for Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, who not only is a fugitive from the law but who is an arch enemy to this Nation. Prayers are not sufficient—prayers of the coward are never answered—prayers of the wife of this traitor are synthetic and but a part of the gesture prearranged for the return to this great land of ours of one who deserted it in a moment of peril.

It is my idea, Mr. Speaker, that the wife of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll—and I am ashamed to think the name of Grover Cleveland is a part of his name—should never have been allowed to set foot on our soil. Her representation of the coward Bergdoll is a blasphemy to the patriotism of every ex-service man in this Nation, and I trust her stay will be limited to a minimum time.

Of course, I know there is nothing like the balm of a sympathizing soul, and to hold your peace in the shadow of another's grief is oftentimes more balm and consolation than anything else, and I subscribe to this as an ordinary thing; but the wife of this cowardly slacker should not expect this sort of sympathy in the light of the facts. If the wife of this fugitive wants sympathy, let her hail her spouse before our tribunals, where he has been justly and legally convicted, to answer the judgment that has already been pronounced. She will not make this gesture; certainly not, for the reason that Grover Cleveland Bergdoll did not give her any such instructions when she left Germany. The prayer of a coward is never answered, and Bergdoll will never be allowed to return to this Nation unless he returns as the prisoner he is.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. McGROARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Friday after the reading of the Journal and consideration of matters on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes. The National Association of Mother's Day has requested me to address the House on next Friday on the subject of Mother's Day, and I would like to do it, so I ask unanimous consent accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heretofore announced that he will not recognize any request for unanimous consent to address the House earlier than the day before the address was to be delivered. The gentleman from California refers to the fact that this address is to be delivered on Mother's Day, and he has been requested to make the address. The Chair, under the circumstances, will ignore the policy heretofore established and submit this request.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. McGROARTY]?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I say that this is such an important matter and such an important occasion that I think the Chair is exactly right in making an exception and submitting the request. I think the distinguished gentleman from California should be granted the time he requests to speak on Mother's Day, and I hope that none of our colleagues will object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, did I understand the Speaker to say that he was willing to hold in abeyance his former general order that he would not recognize requests of this kind more than 48 hours in advance?

The SPEAKER. Solely because this is an address on Mother's Day. [Applause.]

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

KIDNAPING AT GALLUP, N. MEX.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call the attention of the House to the unfortunate situation which exists in Gallup, N. Mex., where an attorney by the name of David Levinson and a labor leader and journalist by the name of Robert Minor have been kidnaped and brutally beaten. Both of these gentlemen went to New Mexico for the purpose of arranging for the defense of several people who had been arrested on a charge of murder after a so-called "riot" had taken place several weeks ago in front of the courthouse. This labor lawyer and this labor journalist went there for the sole purpose, I repeat, of arranging for the defense of men who were charged with murder, men who were held without bail. Both Levinson and Minor were placed in an automobile, brutally beaten, and taken across the border, and were found in the State of Arizona.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that this case comes entirely within the Lindbergh Kidnaping Act adopted by this Congress. I also submit that it is high time that Members of the House, as well as Members of the Senate, and every liberty-loving person, every person who believes in the Constitution of the United States, especially in the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, should rally around this cause and see to it that the Attorney General of the United States takes action to prosecute these terrorists who are making a scrap of paper of the Constitution of the United States, and who are destroying the last vestiges of civil liberties in the United States of America.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Chair admonish occupants of the gallery that they are violating the rules of the House in applauding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that applause in the gallery is not permitted under the rules of the House. Occupants of the gallery are here as guests of the House. The Chair is sure they will observe the rules.

ELEVENTH OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1803) to authorize the Secretary of War to pay certain expenses incident to the training, attendance, and participation of the equestrian and modern pentathlon teams in the Eleventh Olympic Games.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he cannot entertain the request at this time in view of the statement made on Thursday that no business of any kind would be considered today except the banking bill. The Chair hopes the gentleman will withdraw his request and present it on Monday.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Very well, Mr. Speaker; I withdraw the request.

BANKING ACT, 1935

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide for the sound, effective, and uninterrupted operation of the banking system, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7617, with Mr. WOODRUM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. For the purpose of making an inquiry of the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Michigan, the Chair states that the RECORD shows the gentleman from Alabama has consumed 9 hours and 33 minutes and the gentleman from Michigan 6 hours and 45 minutes. The Chair would like to be advised whether it is the intention of the gentlemen to adhere to an equal division of the time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan and myself understand each other. He has the liberty to proceed whenever he desires. If he does not yield time in his turn, then I am to yield time further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wanted to be sure there would be no misunderstanding.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE].

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, the subject of banking is so abstruse that I shall address my remarks to certain features of the bill that I think are understood and which are of interest to the people.

Title I contains the proposed amendments to the laws upon the insurance of bank deposits. The temporary deposit-insurance fund and the fund for mutuals are consolidated and a permanent insurance plan is provided. The term "insured deposit" means such part of the net amount due any depositor for deposits in an insured bank after deducting offsets as shall not exceed $5,000.

The benefits that have resulted to the people of the United States by the creation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation can never be even approximately estimated. It has restored faith in our banks. It has given a renewed hope and confidence to the business interests. Ninety-eight percent of all the depositors are insured in full. About 44 percent of the deposits are insured.

The total assets of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation are now $330,000,000—$150,000,000 has been contributed by the Government; $140,000,000 by the Federal Reserve; $40,000,000 has been realized from assessments on the banks.

It has sustained in losses approximately $1,500,000 actually paid.

Its earnings have been about $9,000,000 per year.

Its expenses are two and one-fourth million dollars last year.

The assessment of one-eighth of 1 percent will realize at the present time about $60,000,000 a year.

Every bank in the United States that is solvent may join this fund.

Fifteen banks are now in process of liquidation; 95 percent of the deposits of these banks were insured and were paid in full by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation within 10 days after they took control. The deposit liability to the depositors of the entire 15 banks was $2,137,000, which is the total paid liability to the present time of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The change in the present bill that permits the State banks to become members of the fund without condition as to becoming members of the Federal Reserve has brought great relief and satisfaction to the State banks. This protection is absolutely necessary for the continued operation of the small State banks. These banks are officered by citizens of the various communities where located, who are conversant with the local needs and the credit requirements and financial ability of their patrons. They are quasi-public institutions. They feel the responsibility that is upon them. It has been largely through them that the banking needs of the smaller communities have been supplied, and to withdraw the protection of membership in the Federal deposit-insurance fund at this time would mean the destruction of many of them. This would be a national tragedy. However much we desire eventually a unified banking system, we should not proceed to obtain it in a manner that would involve such disastrous consequences to so great a number of our citizens and our smaller communities.

There are 1,058 commercial banks that are not members of the F. D. I. C. These banks have $500,000,000 in deposits as against $39,000,000,000 of insured deposits in the insured banks. There are 2,314 insured banks that are not members of the Federal Reserve System.

Probably 75 percent of the uninsured banks could not qualify for membership in the Federal Reserve System.

There are 44 percent of all the deposits in the insured banks insured under the $5,000 limitation. However, if you take out of the list of insured banks three or four hundred of the very large banks, the percentage of the insured deposits will rise very rapidly, and there would probably be 70 percent of the deposits in the remaining banks insured.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation now insures 70 percent of the deposits in 90 percent of the banks, and the other 10 percent in number, the very large metropolitan banks, where the deposits are over five million, reduce the total percentage of insured deposits to about 44 percent.

I desire to give some figures about the probable cost of deposit insurance and the adequacy of the proposed rates of assessment. In the table on the left, showing the hypothetical cost of such insurance from January 1, 1921, to March 15, 1933, it was assumed that the insured portion of the deposits of closed banks amounted to 45 percent of the total deposits of those banks. In fact, however, the insured deposits under the $5,000 limitation would have amounted to 70 percent of the total deposits in closed banks. The reason for this difference in the percentages is readily explained. On October 1, 1934, approximately 45 percent of the deposits of insured banks was covered by insurance under the $5,000 limitation. The percentage of coverage was, however, much higher in small banks than in large banks; the coverage, for example, in banks with deposits of not more than $100,000 amounted to 93 percent, while that of banks with deposits of more than $50,000,000 amounted only to 26 percent. A much larger proportion of small banks have failed than of large banks, and as a result the liability of the insurance fund in the case of suspended banks is a much larger percentage of total deposits than in the case of active banks. When the size of the banks which suspended during the period from January 1, 1921, to March 15, 1933, is taken into consideration it is found that the insured deposits would have amounted, under the $5,000 limitation, to 70 percent of total deposits.

The correction of this error makes a very striking difference in the conclusions as to the adequacy of the proposed rates of assessment. It increases the eventual losses to be paid out of assessments by 55 percent, raising the total for the entire period from January 1, 1921, to March 15, 1933, to the figure of $1,572,000,000. With a rate of assessment of one-eighth of 1 percent, the Insurance Corporation would have used up all of its initial capital and surplus of $325,000,000 and would have, in addition, incurred a deficit of approximately $500,000,000 after allowing for complete liquidation and all recoveries therefrom. At an assessment of one-twelfth of 1 percent, the Corporation would have used up its initial capital and would have incurred in addition a deficit of approximately $840,000,000. It has been assumed, in making these computations, that the Corporation would have been able to borrow at the rate of 3½ percent, the same rate as it is assumed it would receive on its available investment funds.

Two other points in connection with this computation may be mentioned. First, the losses occurring on account of the banks which closed during the banking holiday and failed to reopen, or reopened with a portion of their deposits waived, have not been taken into account. Second, it has been assumed that all mutual savings banks would have been members of the fund. At present only a few of the mutual savings banks are insured. If the assessments for the period 1921–33 are computed with the mutual savings banks taken out, the annual income of the Corporation would have been from five to twelve million dollars smaller than the figures used in the foregoing estimates. Losses to depositors in mutual savings banks amounted only to about $1,000,000. Exclusion of the mutual savings banks would raise the estimates of the final deficit to $630,000,000 with assessments at the rate of one-eighth of 1 percent, or to $930,000,000, with assessments at the rate of one-twelfth of 1 percent.

It would, in fact, have taken a rate of 27 cents for each $100 of deposits in active commercial banks, or more than one-fourth of 1 percent, to have covered the losses in commercial banks from January 1, 1921, to March 15, 1933, and to have kept the original capital of the corporation intact. The necessary rate would have been 23 cents per $100, only slightly below one-fourth of 1 percent, if assessments were collected from all mutual savings banks as well as commercial banks.

If it is desired to leave out of consideration the suspensions occurring during 1930–33, and to take only those during the years 1921–29, a rate of one-eighth of 1 percent would have paid the losses and have kept the capital of the corporation practically intact. At a rate of one-twelfth of 1 percent, however, the bulk of the original capital would have been used up, and the Corporation would have approached the beginning of the crisis years with a very small capital fund.

With an assessment rate of one-eighth of 1 percent, the deficit which would have been incurred between January 1, 1930, and March 15, 1933, would have necessitated borrowing by the Corporation of approximately $1,100,000,000, or considerably more than the amount permitted by the law—assumed to be $975,000,000, or three times the original capital. The Corporation would thus have completely exhausted both its original capital and its borrowing power prior to the banking holiday. At an assessment rate of one-twelfth of 1 percent, the deficit by the date of the banking holiday would have exceeded the borrowing power of the Corporation by about $400,000,000. These deficits are computed on the assumption that mutual savings banks were assessed, and would have been still larger if only commercial banks were members of the fund.

The accompanying table shows, for each year during the period 1921–33, the losses on deposits in suspended banks and the capital and surplus of the fund at the beginning of each year, as estimated: (a) On the erroneous assumption that 45 percent of the deposits of suspended banks would have been insured; and (b) on the correct assumption that 70 percent of those deposits would have been insured. In computing the capital and surplus at the beginning of each year allowance has been made for immediate payment of insured deposits in full and for the recoveries from the liquidation of previously closed banks, as well as for income from assessments and interest on the invested funds of the Corporation.

I shall insert at this point in my remarks a table showing the estimated annual losses on insured deposits and estimated annual capital and surplus of a hypothetical deposit-insurance corporation operating from January 1, 1921, to March 15, 1933.

These statistics were submitted at a Senate hearing and were based on the assumption that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation would insure but 45 percent of the deposits; whereas the facts shown by the experience of the recent banks that have gone through liquidation is that actually 70 percent of the deposits of the banks are insured.

The tables referred to follow:

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. It would not be surprising if the gentleman did not have the information I wish, but does the gentleman happen to know how many of those banks which were turned down by the F. D. I. C. are still doing a banking business?

Mr. SPENCE. I cannot answer that question specifically. There are, however, a great number of banks not members of the F. D. I. C.

Mr. FIESINGER. I understand that.

Mr. SPENCE. I do not know the number that have made applications.

Mr. FIESINGER. I think the number has been stated during the general debate. It is quite large.

Mr. SPENCE. It is over a thousand.

Mr. FIESINGER. But that is from choice rather than necessity.

Mr. SPENCE. I think it is almost entirely from choice. There may be a few, however. I am sorry I do not have the facts.

Mr. FIESINGER. I was wondering if the committee had any information as to how these banks were faring that because of necessity were not in the F. D. I. C.

Mr. SPENCE. There are 1,058 commercial banks not members of the F. D. I. C. How many of these are out voluntarily, I do not know. There are 2,314 insured banks not members of the Federal Reserve System; and I have been told authoritatively that not more than 75 percent of these could qualify for membership in the Federal Reserve System. If membership in the Federal Reserve System were a prerequisite for membership in the F. D. I. C. it would preclude them from being members of the F. D. I. C.

I state these figures merely because I think of all the agencies that have had an effect in bringing back to an extent normal conditions in this country none has been more effective than the F. D. I. C. I believe we should do everything possible to strengthen the hands of this Corporation and to see that it has sufficient income to give it a solvency that would make its influence continue during all time.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. It has not reduced the amount of the Postal Savings deposits, however. They are still around $1,250,000,000. This money should be restored to the banks.

Mr. SPENCE. I think some law should be passed that would persuade the people to put their money back in the banks of the country where it is just as safe as it possibly could be.

Mr. PIERCE. Does the gentleman know the reason why these banks are not all required to come into the Federal insurance system? I cannot see the reason why an exception is made.

Mr. SPENCE. I believe that a small uninsured bank in competition with an insured bank would have great difficulty to exist. I think there are very strong reasons that will influence the banks to come into the system voluntarily.

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman stated a while ago that quite a percentage of the banks could not qualify for admission to the Federal Reserve System. Is this on account of their paper?

Mr. SPENCE. It is on account of their capital structure. The law, of course, states that the capital requirements may be waived; but this is permissive only, and there is no absolute direction to the authorities that they shall waive these capital requirements; it is optional with them.

Mr. PIERCE. Apparently more than a thousand banks cannot qualify.

Mr. FIESINGER. If I may interrupt, are not the most of the banks in the F. D. I. C. in the eastern part of the country, Boston, New England, and do they not include mutual savings banks?

Mr. SPENCE. I have not those statistics; I do not know where they are. They are mostly small banks. A few of the larger banks have not come in. I think, generally, they are the small banks.

Mr. FIESINGER. There may be towns in which there are only two banks. If one is insured and the other is not, both could not exist.

Mr. SPENCE. The uninsured one will have to be insured for its own protection.

Mr. Chairman, I can understand this measure, but I have avoided going into the stormy waters of national finance. I have an opinion about this bill that I have not heard many people express, but it is such a firm conviction upon my part that I am going to speak of it to the Members of the House. Although I am heartily in favor of the purposes of this bill, I do not believe it is a constitutional bill as drawn. I do not believe that this Congress can delegate its legislative power to any board and when they attempt to do that they abdicate the power which the Constitution says they must retain.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 13 additional minutes.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, when Mr. Eccles was on the stand I asked him this question, which appears at page 309 of the hearings:

> Governor Eccles, do you consider this bill, if passed, will be an attempt by Congress to exercise its constitutional legislative function to regulate the value of money?

The answer was:

> I should say it would be a case of Congress delegating to a body that power and that responsibility as defined in this statement that I just read.

How do they delegate their power? They delegate it under this provision, which has neither restriction nor condition in it. It is an absolute delegation of power to eight men to control the economic and monetary policy of this Government.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Does not the gentleman think that the only power Congress can delegate under the Constitution is administrative power?

Mr. SPENCE. Absolutely.

> It shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise such powers as it possesses in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to business stability and to mitigate by its influence unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action.

What does this mean? Is there a restriction there that is a delegation of the legislative power of this Congress and an abdication of our powers and our responsibilities? I believe Mr. Eccles has the right idea. He is a man of keen and analytical mind, a very capable man. I do not mean to say anything against this Board, but I want the Government to come back and be a government of law and not a government of men.

Baron Rothschild once made the statement:

> Permit me to issue and control the money of a nation, and I care not who makes its laws.

It is the greatest power that was ever delegated to a body of men anywhere in any civilized country, and it is a power that we have no right under the Constitution to delegate.

In Wayman v. Southard (10 Wheat. 41) Chief Justice Marshall said:

> It will not be contended that Congress can delegate to the courts, or to any other tribunals, powers which are strictly and exclusively legislative. * * * The line has not been exactly drawn which separates those important subjects, which must be entirely regulated by the legislature itself, from those of less interest, in which a general provision may be made, and power given to those who are to act under such general provisions to fill up the details.

Is the delegation of the economic policy and the monetary policy of the Nation an important subject, or is it one of the administrative details that can be filled in? Under all of the decisions it will be found that Congress has been inhibited from delegating its legislative power, which is a power which has been intrusted to us by the people, and they expect us to exercise the power under the Constitution. It cannot be delegated.

In Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 650), it was held as follows:

> The authority conferred upon the President by section 3 of the act of October 1, 1890, to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes (26 Stat., c. 1244, pp. 567, 612), to suspend by proclamation the free introduction of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, when he is satisfied that any country producing such articles imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States which he may deem to be reciprocally unequal or unreasonable, is not open to the objection that it unconstitutionally transfers legislative power to the President (Fuller, C. J., and Lamar, J., dissenting); but even if it were, it does not follow that other parts of the act imposing duties upon imported articles are inoperative.

In that case, the Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan, at page 692, said:

> That Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The act of October 1, 1890, in the particular under consideration, is not inconsistent with that principle. It does not, in any real sense, invest the President with the power of legislation. For the purpose of securing reciprocal trade with countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, Congress itself determined that the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, permitting the free introduction of such articles, should be suspended as to any country producing and exporting them that imposed exactions and duties on the agricultural and other products of the United States which the President deemed—that is, which he found to be—reciprocally unequal and unreasonable. Congress itself prescribed, in advance, the duties to be levied, collected, and paid on sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides produced by or exported from such designated country while the suspension lasted. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President.

This was not a delegation of power to an appointive board. It was delegation of power to an elective officer of the people, responsible directly to the people, the President of the United States; and if it had been a legislative power, he would have been prohibited from exercising it.

> The words, "he may deem", in the third section, of course, implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, and form a judgment as to whether they were reciprocally equal and reasonable, or the contrary, in their effect upon American products. But when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions, reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, were imposed upon the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides, it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring the suspension, as to that country, which Congress had determined should occur. He had no discretion in the premises except in respect to the duration of the suspension so ordered. But that related only to the enforcement of the policy established by Congress. As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it cannot be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the lawmaking department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself, as it left the hands of Congress, that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, from particular countries, should be suspended, in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

This distinction is drawn very clearly. In the case of United States v. Grimaud, 220 U. S. 506, the Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Lamar, said at page 517:

It must be admitted that it is difficult to define the line which separates legislative power to make laws, from administrative authority to make regulations.

That is not difficult in this case. There is nothing here at all in regard to granting power to make administrative rules. It is the delegation of all the power we have over one of the most important subjects that the Congress of the United States can legislate upon.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FIESINGER. I am so thoroughly in accord with what the gentleman is saying I wanted to see if I had the right idea. The Congress may set up a principle, then it may say to an administrative board that it shall have discretion as to how to put that principle into effect, but it cannot convey a discretion without setting up a principle?

Mr. SPENCE. The gentleman is correct. The gentleman's agreement with me, as I am well acquainted with his fine legal ability, bolsters me up very much, because I have not as yet heard this argument made.

Mr. O'NEAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. O'NEAL. What is the remedy if one agrees with the gentleman in his position but wants to vote for the F. D. I. C.?

Mr. SPENCE. Vote for some of the amendments which will be offered in an endeavor to limit the authority. I will vote for any reasonable and proper amendment which has for its object that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I know very little about finances, and I do not think I will ever learn, but I have attempted in my humble way to study the Constitution. I am convinced that the powers granted in this bill are not granted in a manner conforming to constitutional requirements.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. May I say that I do not think any member of the committee, either on the majority or on the minority side, will agree that the gentleman does not know anything about constitutional law.

Mr. SPENCE. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

In considering this question of delegation of powers, Chief Justice Marshall in Wayman v. Southard (10 Wheat. 1, 42), where he was considering the authority of courts to make rules, said:

It will not be contended that Congress can delegate to the courts, or to any other tribunals, powers which are strictly and exclusively legislative. But Congress may certainly delegate to others, powers which the legislature may rightfully exercise itself.

This is an important subject. We are delegating, without conditions of any kind, power to a board to exercise the most important functions of the legislative body that we were charged to exercise when the people elected us to this, the greatest deliberative body in the world.

Mr. Chairman, I can see why some of these things are done. These laws are drafted by commissions. They are drafted by bureaus which bring them in here and we accept them. It is a natural instinct of human nature to want more power, and I believe that we are going to denude ourselves of our authority so that what vestige we have remaining will hardly be worth a struggle to retain if we continue.

What were these nonlegislative powers which Congress could exercise but which might also be delegated to others was not determined, for Chief Justice Marshall said:

The line has not been exactly drawn which separates those important subjects, which must be entirely regulated by the legislature itself, from those of less interest, in which a general provision may be made, and power given to those who are to act under such general provisions to fill up the details.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SISSON. I believe the gentleman is making a very able argument, and I want to see if I understand the gentleman's contention with reference to the third paragraph of the bill, which the gentleman is discussing, as to whether it is in accordance with the Constitution or not.

Is it the gentleman's opinion that if in this bill the Congress gave a specific direction to the Federal Reserve Board to regulate the currency so as to make it accord with a certain level of prices, so to speak, that would meet the gentleman's objections?

Mr. SPENCE. I think it would—a specific direction.

Let me read you something from a recent case. This is from a very able opinion of Chief Justice Hughes in the Hot Oil case, which is right in point. There a direction was given to the President—the President in whom we all have confidence and whom we all love and believe in—a general direction such as this, allowing him through the making of allocation of quotas to limit the production of oil, and it was held he could not do it because that was a legislative function.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SPENCE. Here is what Chief Justice Hughes said in this case:

Fourth. Section 9 (c) is assailed upon the ground that it is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power.

It was a delegation of power just like this of glittering generalities telling the President what he ought to do without giving any specific directions.

The section purports to authorize the President to pass a prohibitory law. The subject to which this authority relates is defined. It is the transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum and petroleum products which are produced or withdrawn from storage in excess of the amount permitted by State authority. Assuming for the present purpose, without deciding, that the Congress has power to interdict the transportation of that excess in interstate and foreign commerce, the question whether that transportation shall be prohibited by law is obviously one of legislative policy.

Is not that in point with the case?

Accordingly, we look to the statute to see whether the Congress has declared a policy with respect to that subject; whether the Congress has set up a standard for the President's action; whether the Congress has required any finding by the President in the exercise of the authority to enact the prohibition.

Section 9 (c) is brief and unambiguous. It does not attempt to control the production of petroleum and petroleum products within a State. It does not seek to lay down rules for the guidance of State legislatures or State officers. It leaves to the States and to their constituted authorities the determination of what production shall be permitted. It does not qualify the President's authority by reference to the basis, or extent, of the States limitation of production.

I have not time to read all of this, but I want you to know just what the Court said in this case.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one other question?

Mr. SPENCE. I am always pleased to yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman recalls the very able statement made before the committee by Senator Owen. Is it the gentleman's view that in this legislation and with respect to the particular point the gentleman is discussing, in one sense, as I understood Senator Owen to say, we are not going far enough?

Mr. SPENCE. I do not think it is a limitation on how far he will go. The question is how far does Congress want to go and if Congress itself gives the directions and makes the limitations, it can go as far as it pleases, but we are delegating to a board an absolute power, not only of action, but of discretion and judgment. There is the distinction.

Mr. SISSON. Is it the gentleman's view that this legislation should give a mandate to the Federal Reserve Board as to just how to expand the currency through the control of credits, and so forth?

Mr. SPENCE. I think so, and being convinced that that is the law and having great confidence in my distinguished friend from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] who has a mandate to offer, I shall vote for his mandate. I would vote for any mandate that I felt was at all reasonable that would direct this board as to how it should discharge its functions, because I do not believe the Congress has the power to abdicate its responsibility, or its legislative functions. Here is what the Chief Justice said further in the Hot Oil case:

> The Constitution provides that "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." (Art. I, sec. 1.) And the Congress is empowered "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" its general powers. (Art. I, sec. 8, par. 18.) The Congress manifestly is not permitted to abdicate, or to transfer to others, the essential legislative functions with which it is thus vested. Undoubtedly legislation must often be adapted to complex conditions involving a host of details with which the national legislature cannot deal directly.

And we contend this is exactly that character of case.

The Constitution has never been regarded as denying to the Congress the necessary resources of flexibility and practicality which will enable it to perform its function in laying down policies and establishing standards, while leaving to selected instrumentalities the making of subordinate rules within prescribed limits and the determination of facts to which the policy as declared by the legislature is to apply. Without capacity to give authorization of that sort, we should have the anomaly of a legislative power which, in many circumstances, calling for its exertion would be but a futility. But the constant recognition of the necessity and validity of such provisions, and the wide range of administrative authority which has been developed by means of them, cannot be allowed to obscure the limitations of the authority to delegate, if our constitutional system is to be maintained.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Kentucky 5 additional minutes.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. As I understand it, the gentleman thinks the bill as now drawn contains an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority?

Mr. SPENCE. I do.

Mr. HALLECK. And I would assume from that if the amendment which will be offered by the gentleman from Maryland does not prevail, the gentleman would not vote for this bill on final passage with such an unconstitutional provision in it?

Mr. SPENCE. Well, I am not going to be committed on that.

I believe those who drafted the Constitution of the United States were probably the wisest men that ever sat around a council table. I have always believed this. I believe it was Gladstone who said that it was the greatest instrument that was ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man. There are many principles in the Constitution, and this is one of the greatest. They wanted the people and their elected representatives to retain their constitutional powers. They knew how insidiously those powers might be divested. The power to coin money and regulate the value thereof is a high governmental power. It is a power upon which depend the peace and happiness of our people, as well as their prosperity, and this is a power which it seems obvious to me cannot be delegated.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. Of course, the limitation that has been attempted to be put in this bill is in section 204 at the top of page 51, where I believe the general policy of Congress is laid down.

Mr. SPENCE. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. And that is substantially the same provision that is in the Canadian banking charter, is it not?

Mr. SPENCE. Canada has no constitution, while we have.

Mr. HARLAN. That is the difference between the two, and that is what the gentleman conceives to be our constitutional limitation.

Mr. SPENCE. I do not know anything about what it would be in Canada, but I think it transcends the provisions of our Constitution.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. The gentleman has made such a refreshing statement I want to make the further observation that I think, without straining this great document, the Constitution of the United States, we can settle all our economic questions.

Mr. SPENCE. I think so. I have never thought the Constitution stood in the way of the legitimate progress of the people, but I think this is an essential function that the people should retain.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. EKWALL. I think the gentleman has made one of the most illuminating statements we have heard during the general debate; and inasmuch as we have allowed our constitutional rights to be chiseled from time to time, does not the gentleman think this would be an appropriate time and would afford us a good opportunity to start on our way back to our constitutional rights and to having Congress assume its constitutional functions?

Mr. SPENCE. Do you not know how it has been done; does not every Member of Congress know how it has been done? Do you not know that each party attempts to protect its own bureaucrats?

I have the greatest confidence in the men now handling the Reserve Board, but it is a government of men and not of laws. You cannot substitute a government of men for a government of laws. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, as a member of the minority, I want to first pay my compliments to the entire membership of the Banking and Currency Committee, particularly those members of the majority who have labored so earnestly and intelligently to bring out a banking bill which is in accordance with the policies of the present administration. Whatever I have to say will not be in criticism of the activity of any particular member of the committee on either the majority or minority side, but I am going to try and confine myself as much as I can in this statement to a discussion of the bill itself.

We started the hearings on the bill in the middle of February, and we have been in almost constant daily session both morning and afternoon since that time.

In the committee there was almost no partisanship with respect to the consideration of this bill any more than there is in any bill before the Banking and Currency Committee.

I particularly want to pay my compliments and respect to the chairman of the committee for the courtesy he has shown the minority members of the committee, in advancing a policy which is perhaps diametrically opposite to the recommendations of the majority.

He has been extremely courteous, and we have had full opportunity to present our side of the case.

There is only one important difference in our views, and that is whether the banks of the United States shall be brought under such political control as to be a bad influence on our banking institutions.

I hope the minority will be pardoned for adhering almost too closely to that old truism, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty", because we have been serious and sincere in the thought that this bill, because of its political character—I do not mean partisan character—will react to the detriment of the banking institutions of America and will in no manner—I am speaking of title II—benefit the banking institutions.

This legislation is intended to be permanent. It is not presented as an emergency measure, and so its desirability must be considered in the light of the permanent effect which it will have on our people.

During the debate we have had a great deal of discussion relative to money, the purposes of the banks, the affiliation of the currency-creating power with the national debt, the expansion of the currency and inflation, and all those other matters which are closely related to the bill. The debate has been decidedly interesting. I think the Membership of the House can get a great deal of good from the talks which have been made here on the floor with respect to all these questions.

Before I go further, I must also pay my respects to the intelligence and ability of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE], who has just so ably presented to the Committee certain phases of the matter which have not been touched on heretofore. I think the Committee owes him a debt of gratitude for bringing into the open one of the major complaints which we have had against the centralization and political control of the banks of the United States.

With respect to banks and banking, during the months that I have been in Congress I have listened with a great deal of interest to the attacks on our system, and more particularly have I listened with much interest to the attacks on bankers as a whole, and to the unlearned—and I put myself in that category—one might assume that all bankers are crooks and thieves, and that their only purpose in life is to rob the people of the money which the people have deposited in their banks. We started out 2 years ago denouncing the international bankers, and laying all of the economic ills of America upon their doorstep. I know it is very unpopular to say anything good at the present time with respect to international bankers, and it is very unpopular to say anything which might reflect to the benefit of private bankers. I say private bankers as distinguished from public banking, because all of our banks at the present time are private banks.

I do not want to be put in the position of representing these obnoxious, pernicious bankers who, it is alleged, are destroying all of the American institutions for which we have fought for a good many years; but perhaps my courage in contemplating the effect of some of this criticism will offset somewhat my ignorance of the manner in which bankers have destroyed American ideals. The international banker has his place in our banking system, and the private banker also has a very significant place in our economic system. We are more particularly interested in this bill with the banks as we know them, the banks with which our people deposit their money and from which they obtain their credit, and so probably we should confine ourselves to the private bankers when considering this bill, and the purpose of private banking.

As we have discussed this problem, I have not been able quite as yet in my ignorance of these matters to understand fully wherein the banks of the Nation completely divest their depositors of all of the money which is deposited in the banks. I may have the wrong impression from some of these remarks that have been made, but I gather that that is the purpose behind the criticism, that bankers, in some mystical manner, have it within their power to rob the people who deposit money in their banks. That might be characteristic of a few bankers. We have had doctors who are not above reproach; we have had lawyers who are known to be unscrupulous; and undoubtedly we have had bankers, and still have bankers, who are not above criticism in respect to the manner in which they manage their banks; but, after all, about the only way under our present system that the bankers can get any of the people's money that is deposited in their banks is through a return on the banker's individual investment in that bank, by reason of stock ownership and the salary which he receives as an officer of the bank.

I do not know of any other legal manner by which a banker can get any part of the people's money or the profits of the investment of the people's money. I understand the purpose of banking is to provide a safe place in which the people may deposit their reserves. I understand it to be a place where the small depositor, as distinguished from the large investor, may put his money and have some return from his money while it is being used by that bank, as the depositor knows it will be used by that bank in investment in safe, sound securities. A bank is a place where the merchant and agriculturist and the industrialist may go to get credit with which to carry on his business. And so, when we are listening to these statements against banking and against bankers, we should have in mind the other side of this picture.

If we prevent the banks from investing the people's money, a charge upon the depositors for the service which they get from the banks is necessary, because the banks become mere warehouses where the money is stored. We have seen a new system in banking grow up within the last year or two. Five years ago it was unusual for a bank to make any charge whatsoever to its customers for carrying their commercial accounts. At the present time banks, unless a goodly deposit is left there over and above the needs of the depositor for his business, in which case the interest offsets the charge, banks make a charge for servicing that account to the extent that many banks charge 5 cents for each transaction on that account.

With respect to savings deposits there is not very much difference. Because of the lack of confidence in certain governmental policies industry is not borrowing from the banks. There is no demand by industry, commerce, and agriculture for loans for the purpose of expanding, and for that reason the only market open to the banks, ordinarily, for the investment of the people's money is in Government securities, paying from one-half of 1 percent to 3 percent interest. So, in consequence, the return to the depositor on the money which he has deposited with a bank, usually for the purpose of reinvestment, has been cut so that at the present time it is unusual for a bank to pay its depositors over 2 percent.

I like to look at a bank as a place where, after the establishment of credit for the purpose of expanding industry, agriculture, and commerce, there is a common clearing house whereby credits may offset credits, debits may offset debits, so our commerce, business, and agriculture will be able to carry on without too much detail and interference.

Previous to 1913, when the Federal Reserve Act was established, we found ourselves in a condition whereby each individual bank established its own policy with respect to loans, with respect to discounts, and with respect to credit. It was recognized that there should be some nationalization, some control over this system, some coordination of the efforts on the part of the banks to encourage industry, agriculture, and commerce to expand; and to further facilitate that expansion the Federal Reserve System was created.

That was one purpose of the Federal Reserve System. The other purpose, of course, was to give us a flexible currency, so that the needs of industry, business, and agriculture would be always assured of not only an adequate currency with which to carry on their business, but a safe currency. In furtherance of that, we provided that the Federal Reserve banks might issue currency to meet those needs. Of course, there had to be something behind this currency so we determined that a certain amount of gold or a certain amount of high-class commercial paper or a certain amount of Government obligations would secure the money which was given to the banks and which in turn was loaned to their customers, with which to carry on their business.

In that connection, let me say that the currency-creating power of the Federal Reserve banks was always incidental to their loans. If they did not need money to loan they did not ask for the money. When I say "money", in that respect

I mean currency. If there was no demand for money, then they did not request the issuance of currency. The banks do not profit by turning their Government holdings into money unless they can loan that money out again, and in that manner raise money on the interest paid on those loans, to pay their depositors. So there has never been any desire on the part of the Federal Reserve System to issue a greater amount of currency than was needed from time to time for business transactions.

You will recognize in the Federal Reserve System a complete divorcement of the national debt from the currency-creating power. When I say that the currency-creating power on the part of the Federal Reserve was incidental to its investment in Government obligations, have in mind that at the present time, in rough figures, there is something like $5,000,000,000 of currency outstanding. There are in the neighborhood of $26,000,000,000 of interest-bearing Government obligations outstanding somewhere. Assuming, for the purpose of argument, and believing the statements which have been made, that the banks invest in Government obligations solely for the purpose of allowing them to create currency, of course, there would be a closer relationship between the amount of the currency outstanding and the interest-bearing bonded indebtedness of the United States.

So there has never been an endeavor on the part of the Federal Reserve System to create any more currency than there was need for, which brings me to a very vital part of this question. This bill creates a situation whereby the national debt of the United States is brought into very close affiliation with the currency creating power. It has been quite generally recognized that when any country brings its currency into such close affiliation with its national debt that the one influences the other, that country has just gone broke. To my mind, that is one of the most important questions which this committee has to consider with relation to this bill.

I do not object to the issuance of currency to a certain extent, in the payment of our Government obligations, if by so doing we do not create an unstable currency. If there is not expansion to the point where people become fearful that through inflation the prices of commodities will rise wholly out of keeping with the demand for those commodities, I do not object to the issuance of more currency. For that reason I have voted for bills which, within reason, expand the currency. I expect to vote in this session for other bills which may reasonably expand the currency; but the thing which we must consider in that respect is simply this: It is the fear on the part of the people that when we issue large amounts of new currency without too much security behind them that in some manner the commodity-price index will be affected; that the commodity-price index will rise precipitately, and there is flight from the dollar to commodities.

Then we take every cent we can get, every single dollar of credit we can get, and we invest in commodities, not because we need them, but because we are fearful that the money is going to be so depreciated in value, thereby increasing the price of commodities, that it will be advantageous to invest in commodities so that we can take advantage of the rise in the commodity-price index and make a profit on the turn-over. When that reaches the proportion which it has reached in other countries, which I think know just as much about currency as we do, there is a tendency to create further unnecessary and unwarranted sums to meet the cash requirements. That is what happened in France; that is what happened in Germany; and that is what happened in Austria. I will not dwell upon the dire results of inflation in those countries. You are all as familiar with them as I am.

Now, if there ever comes a time when, through the power which is vested in the Federal Reserve Board by this Act, it is thought advisable on the part of the President, who actually controls the Board, the Board in turn controlling the boards of the several banks, to print large amounts of currency for the purpose of even stabilizing the national debt, then I want you gentlemen and this country to be warned that we may expect nothing but the results of inflation which were so apparent in the three countries which I have named.

It is not altogether the increase in the currency which causes this result; it is the great increase in the velocity of credit attending the output of this new currency, the increase being so rapid that the Government loses control over the situation. Now, you say to me that is just what this bill prevents; that in this bill we prevent undue inflation through open-market operations, through the manipulation of the rediscount rates, through the ability which is afforded the Federal Reserve Board to make far-reaching and arbitrary regulations with respect to reserve requirements. You say that all that is adequately controlled. But is there any presumption on our part that the Board, with its increased powers under this act, will exercise any more intelligence or will meet that situation with any more understanding than the Federal Reserve Board did in 1927? Under present law with respect to the rediscount rate the Federal Reserve banks must initiate the change in those rates.

Existing law provides that every Federal Reserve bank shall have power—distinguishing, of course, as we have done throughout this discussion between Federal Reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board—the law now provides in section 14 of the Federal Reserve Act that every Federal Reserve bank shall have power to establish, from time to time, subject to revision and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, rates of discount to be charged by the Federal Reserve bank for each class of paper, which shall be fixed with a view to accommodating commerce and business.

The question is raised immediately, why has not the Federal Reserve Board exercised whatever powers they have had in changing Federal Reserve rediscount rates to meet changes in conditions in the country? Why did they not do it in 1927 and 1928? Why at that time did they not raise the discount rate high enough so that there would be no inducement on the part of the member banks to lend for speculative purposes?

The answer is found in the fact that the request for an increase in the discount rate must come from the Federal Reserve banks themselves; and it is interesting to note what happened in 1927. If you will permit me, I will read certain excerpts from newspapers of that time showing how difficult it was for the Federal Reserve banks of this Nation to persuade the Federal Reserve Board to raise the discount rate, which would have stopped the orgy of credit inflation which resulted in the crash of 1929.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 additional minutes.

These press excerpts will show how difficult it was for the Federal Reserve banks to induce the Federal Reserve Board to protect the people of the United States against the crash they knew was coming.

The New York Times of September 9, 1927, said:

> The long-debated question of the wisdom of centralized dictation in Washington of the rediscount rates that shall prevail in various parts of the country was brought sharply before the Wall Street banking community yesterday (Sept. 8, 1927) by the announcement that a reduction from 4 to 3½ percent in the rate of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago had been forced by the Federal Reserve Board over the protests of the Chicago bank's directors.

For the sake of emphasis I repeat: The Board of the Federal Reserve Bank in Chicago had protested the action of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington reducing the rediscount rate from 4 to 3½ percent; yet in the face of the warnings by the Federal Reserve Bank in Chicago the Federal Reserve Board in Washington compelled them under an order, the authority for which is questioned, to reduce that discount rate from 4 to 3½ percent. Again, on September 10, 1927, the New York Times said this:

> It was believed that the Federal Reserve Board favored a uniform 3½-percent rate by all of the larger banks, but that the Chicago Reserve Bank's directors do not desire to make that change.

Again, on September 10, the New York Times said, quoting a member of the other body, that the Senator—declared that there was no authority to change the rediscount rate. The Chicago bank on September 6—

Quoting the Senator—

was directed to reduce its rediscount rate one-half of 1 percent following its failure to accept the suggestion of the Board for its reduction. The new rate went into effect September 7.

The Chicago bankers assert that local conditions in this district do not require a change in rate and that the effect of it will be hurtful in the Middle West. They intimate also that the lowered rate may further injure agriculture in the Corn Belt.

The Senator took the position that the Federal Reserve Board had no authority, except in times of great emergency, to prescribe rediscount rates, and that its power in this respect was limited to approval, or disapproval, of rediscount charges proposed by the Federal Reserve banks.

New York Times, September 15, 1927:

All signs point to a lively fight here (Washington) on Friday when the advisory council of the Federal Reserve System will take up for consideration the order issued by the Federal Reserve Board on September 6 requiring the Chicago district bank to lower its rediscount rate from 4 to 3½ percent to conform to the rate in effect elsewhere throughout the country.

Commercial and Financial Chronicle, May 18, 1929:

The Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago applied for permission from the Federal Reserve Board today (May 17) to increase its rediscount rate above 5 percent. * * * The development today revealed that the New York Reserve Bank has also petitioned the Federal Reserve Board for permission to advance its rate, according to reliable sources.

Commercial and Financial Chronicle, May 25, 1929:

Both the Federal Reserve Banks of New York and Chicago have continued to petition the Federal Reserve Board for permission to increase their discount rates from 5 percent to 6 percent. * * * The Federal Advisory Council has recommended to the Reserve Board that the latter grant permission to raise the rediscount rate to 6 percent to the the Reserve banks requesting it.

The directors of the New York and Chicago Federal Reserve Banks received another rebuff from the Federal Reserve Board, it was learned here today (May 25). * * * Both banks have made similar requests during the last 2 or 3 months but have only been turned down. The Boston and Philadelphia banks also have made similar requests with the same results.

The attitude of the Federal Reserve Board is that an increase in the rediscount rates would hurt business, but bankers did not believe that it would have any serious effect.

And so we continued this credit inflation in the face of the warnings of the Federal Reserve banks and against the advice of the Federal Reserve banks to a point that the crash came. It was inevitable. It was predicted by the Chicago bank, the New York bank, and the Philadelphia bank months before it actually happened.

Mr. Chairman, there is no reason for us to assume that the Federal Reserve Board with these arbitrary and far-reaching powers sitting here in Washington will have any clearer insight into the necessity for credit in Chicago, Philadelphia, Atlanta, Dallas, or San Francisco than they had at that time.

The framers of the act, the Members of Congress who sponsored it, were of the opinion that we should set up from 8 to 12 Federal Reserve banks throughout the United States.

Why not centralize it under a controlled body down here in Washington such as we are proposing in the pending bill? Because they knew that the Federal Reserve banks throughout the United States would adopt policies favorable to their clients, their customers. They knew how difficult it was for a central, politically controlled board in Washington to establish one policy for the farmers of the Midwest, the cotton growers of the South, the textile industry of New England, and the manufacturing industries of the Atlantic Coast States. They knew how difficult it was to get a body of men here in Washington who would be able to see with the same perspective all these different districts of the United States. For this reason they, in their sound and studied judgment, set up these 12 banks so that they would be in close communication with the interests they represented.

If the farmers of the Midwest, when the price index of farm commodities is going down, make a demand for credit, the Federal Reserve bank in Chicago should be in a position to lower its rediscount rate to meet this situation. If at the same time that the prices of agricultural commodities in Michigan, Illinois, Ohio, and Indiana are going down, the prices of manufactured products in the East and Atlantic Coast States are going up then the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Boston should be in a position to raise their discount rates to meet the situation. It was never intended, and it is dangerous, to put this diversified power into the hands of a single board in Washington and expect them to intelligently meet the requirements in all parts of the United States. So it was well and fitting that the request for a change in the rediscount rate should be initiated by and come from the Federal Reserve banks themselves.

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. THOM. If I follow the gentleman's argument correctly, I understand that these banks in New York and Chicago suggested an increase in the rediscount rate.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In one instance they suggested an increase and in the other instance they suggested that it be left where it was.

Mr. THOM. Their advice was not taken by the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No.

Mr. THOM. Manifestly the gentleman's plan does not work as it is set up. What does he suggest as to the control of the rediscount rates? Laying aside this bill, what would be the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I suggest that the power to determine the rediscount rate be left just where it is, in the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. THOM. Still subject to approval by the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. THOM. Then the gentleman would have a stalemate.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Not necessarily.

Mr. THOM. The decisions which are reached by the district banks in New York, Chicago, or where not, are of no avail because the Federal Reserve Board differs with their conclusion.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. THOM. Then there is a condition of stalemate existing. Do you not have to have some responsibility in some final authority?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. THOM. Or this scheme of discounting does not work.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The answer to the gentleman's inquiry is if we want to remedy that situation then we can go just as far the other way as we are going in this bill, by determining that the Board of the Federal Reserve banks shall have exclusive power in the determination of rediscount rates.

Mr. THOM. Then the conclusion is we either ought to vest the power fully and completely in the Federal Reserve banks or in the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Not necessarily. I think there is a middle ground that could be agreed upon whereby the Federal Reserve Board would have some advisory jurisdiction over this matter for the purpose of coordinating the activities of the Federal Reserve banks, just as was intended in the original bill.

Mr. THOM. But we would have this division of power that gets us nowhere under these circumstances.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My point is I would rather have 12 banks each determining for themselves the rediscount rate in 12 districts than to have a Federal Reserve Board at Washington under the control of a single individual, who might be susceptible to private interests, determining the rediscount rate here at Washington for the farmers of the West and at the same time try to determine a safe and adequate rediscount rate for the industrial East.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. The local banks know the situation in the part of the country in which they operate. They certainly would know how to remedy anything which appeared to be threatening the soundness of their investment much better than a body located in Washington. No matter how the body in Washington tried to be of service to the 12 banks, they would not necessarily know the conditions as well as the men who are operating in the particular district. That is the reason why each bank should decide for itself when to lower or raise discount rates?

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is exactly my point. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Now, going on to another question, the President in his inaugural address said that he felt it advisable, and I am quoting in substance, not literally, to decentralize the population of the United States. In subsequent addresses he has given us the impression that because of the relief load being carried in large urban communities it would be better to take some of the poor people from the cities and put them out on small farms. His is a program of the decentralization of population. I do not care to argue the merits of that proposition, but I want to point out an inconsistency in this bill with that policy.

My fear is that we have taken the initial step toward not only the centralization and arbitrary political control of credit in the United States but I am very greatly concerned about the attitude of the Board in respect to loan policies. As I say, I am fearful this bill operates only as an entering wedge, and the initial step to further legislation by which the central Board in Washington can tell my bank in Port Huron whether they will lend to a paper mill or brass works or a foundry in my city, and, if so, under what conditions my bank may grant that credit.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, with this central Board in Washington having the power constantly to tell my bank, through the instrumentality of the Chicago bank, what reserves are required, what the rediscount rate shall be, and how many Government bonds it shall purchase, I am afraid that even under the provisions of this bill the Federal Reserve Board in Washington under the domination of political control can control the industries in Port Huron. With this control of credit my banks must look to the credit centers for their money; my industries must look to the credit centers for their credit; my industries must have their loans checked and balanced against loans to a like industry in Pittsburgh, New York, Philadelphia, Dallas, or wherever they may be, to the point where if one of my industries wants to borrow $10,000 for the purpose of extending its plant and putting men to work, thereby taking them off the relief roll, and it happens that down in Florida or out in California, or anywhere else, there is a like industry which owes the central bank a large amount of money, it is only natural that the policy of the Board down here will be to protect the Federal Reserve banks in their investments in those other industries.

It is only natural that the Federal Reserve bank will, in turn, protect its members against loans to industry coming in competition with other industry, and I do not want to be a party to any activity whereby my industries must come down to Washington and lay their applications for loans on the table and have them turned down because some industry in some other part of the country already owes the central bank a large amount of money and by giving them that loan they would be, to some extent, the security behind the loan, which they hope, at least, will be repaid. Where there is concentration of credit facilities, there is concentration of industry; where there is concentration of industry, there is a concentration of population. This is indeed a peculiar paradox. The administration advocates a decentralization of population, and at the same time expect us to pass this bank bill which, in its operation, will result in a greater centralization of population than we have ever known.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I am wondering if the gentleman has in mind the provisions of subsection (o) on page 51. Would the gentleman object to stating whether they are the provisions which he is now discussing as being dangerous provisions?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; I have no reference to that particularly. I did not want to discuss that section.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. If the gentleman had no reference to that section, I have no questions to ask.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think that has been covered, and while I would like time to discuss it, I think it has been so completely covered I am not going to take up the time of the Committee to do so.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. LUCKEY. Referring to the point the gentleman made in regard to the raising or lowering of the rediscount rate in different sections of the country to the detriment of other sections, is it not a fact that in 1920 the rate was raised in the agricultural sections, bringing about a deflation in the agricultural sections, at first, and then bringing on a collapse in that section, rather than a general deflation over the country?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say to the gentleman I am not acquainted with the mechanics of that operation, but the statement he has made, in substance, may be correct.

Mr. LUCKEY. My understanding is that the Tenth Federal Reserve Bank in Kansas City started to deflate first and that brought a collapse of the agricultural sections of the agricultural States.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The gentleman may be correct. I have not made a particular study of that operation, but I think if the gentleman is correct, it bears out my point that the Central Board down here at Washington did not have the interests of the agricultural Midwest in mind at that time, when it encouraged a situation which resulted in the deflation of farm-commodity prices.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to my colleague from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. As I understand the gentleman's argument relative to draining the resources of the member banks, it is based upon the right of the Federal Reserve Board to raise the reserve requirements. Is that right?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I did not just get the point of the gentleman's question.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I say the gentleman's argument as to transfer of funds from the smaller communities to the larger centers and to the Federal Reserve Banks is based upon the provision in the bill which permits the regional reserve banks to raise the reserve requirements.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think that is correct.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. And the gentleman fears that by that process they will take credit out of the smaller places and put it into the Federal Reserve banks?

Mr. WOLCOTT. They might.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Does the gentleman agree with me in the statement that as soon as that process is started—the result will be, if it is done to any extent, we will say 50 or 60 or 70 percent—there would be an immediate payment by the small-town banks of their obligations to their depositors?

Mr. WOLCOTT. There would be an immediate calling of their loans in that vicinity and the bank would, of course, have to pay its loans and discounts with the Federal Reserve bank.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. What purpose would there be in a bank maintaining itself and keeping the deposits of its depositors if their reserve requirements were raised up to 60 or 70 percent?

Mr. WOLCOTT. There would be no inducement.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. None whatsoever. I think immediately the result would be the bank would pay off its depositors because it cannot get any interest on its balance in the Federal Reserve bank, and there I think comes the answer to the gentleman's argument in section (o) to which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] referred. If the result of calling in the reserves is to diminish the deposits in the banks, it certainly would tend to unstabilize the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment. I think, if the gentleman will permit me a moment, the purpose of section (o) is to prevent just such a thing as the gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let me say that section (o) merely establishes a policy and is not mandatory in any particular.

There has been criticism of the fact that to help one section of the country the administration has wrought havoc in other sections of the country. There has been criticism of the fact that the sugar-beet farmers of Michigan and Colorado and Ohio and Indiana and all the rest of the sugar-producing States are now seriously encumbered by a very undesirable sugar-control act. We feel that the policy of the administration is wrong in that respect. We felt that the policy of the administration was wrong in increasing the preferential on the importation of Cuban sugar and the decrease of one-half of 1 percent in the world rate on sugar, but it was done. We had given them the power to do it, and it was done; and we can talk as loud as possible about it and the condition still remains, to the extent that three sugar-beet factories have closed in Michigan and within 20 miles of my home city 5,000 acres of sugar beets have gone out of cultivation.

We have heard the charge made recently that because of the policy of the administration with respect to the importation of Japanese textiles, the textile factories of New England are closing. These are questions of policy upon which different sections of the country disagree. The cotton farmer of the South does not want a tariff, while the industrial north wants a tariff. It has been said that tariffs are local issues. Whether they are or not I do not know. I think there is a middle ground which might be worked out, but I do not want to discuss the tariff today. I just use these as examples of the diversity of interests in the different sections of the country and the impossibility of the President and the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, with all the intelligence and experience at their command, being able to establish a policy here in Washington that will be beneficial to all parts of the country and will not be injurious to some parts of the country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, I may say that my mind has run to details in connection with this bill. I feel that I am fairly familiar with the various sections in the three titles, and I would be glad at any time to stop and give you the benefit of whatever knowledge I have respecting any particular section.

I am very happy that my colleague from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] spoke as he did of the banking fraternity in general. I think that sometimes the people do not fully realize the record that has been made from 1929 to 1935 by the bankers of the country. Knowing as I do that it is an unpopular thing to stand here and say anything favorable to the bankers I, nevertheless, venture to do so. When I speak of them I am not speaking of the bankers in the great financial and industrial sections of the country alone, although I think they ought to have their day in court, I am speaking of the average town and country banker. I say now that from 1929 down to the present time they have done a very good job.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I would like to say, considering the banking situation of the country, that if there is any criticism at all it is of the system rather than the character of the bankers themselves.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman. I am going to give you briefly an idea of what was done from 1929 down to the present.

In 1929 there were $58,000,000,000 in bank deposits. That includes all banks, public banks and private banks. The available figures show that deposits have shrunk to $47,000,000,000, a shrinkage of $11,000,000,000 in bank deposits from 1929 down to the present—the figures are for March 1935.

There was a total loss of deposits by suspension of $6,000,000,000—and when I say suspension I mean the total amount of deposits in the banks that were suspended, but not by any means losses, because the losses were very much less, of course, than the total amount of deposits in suspended banks.

The difference between the $6,000,000,000 and the $11,000,000,000 represents the money that has been taken out of the banks since 1929 and not redeposited. I do not feel that I should quote my authority upon this subject, because naturally there may be some changes in the final figures. The estimates I give may be a little off, but the latest estimate that I can get from authentic sources in the Government is that the recovery will be the sum of approximately $4,000,000,000. In other words, on a total deposit liability of $58,000,000,000 in 1929, we will probably have a net loss of $2,000,000,000. That means that if all of the losses in all banks were equally divided among all depositors, each depositor would have remaining $96.50 to his credit today.

In other words, there has been an average loss of 3½ percent to depositors in this tremendous depression that we have suffered from from 1929 to the present time. It is a better record than has been made in any other major line of investment in the United States. If you had invested in real estate, in bonds, in stocks, or had hoarded your money, you would have been worse off than if you had placed this money in the average bank in the United States.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. COLDEN. I dislike to divert the gentleman from his argument, but the gentleman quoted the amount of the deposits, which does not show any such proportion of loss to the country as the country has suffered. The velocity of money enters into our depression a great deal, and the very fact that these deposits are frozen to a great extent has had a wide effect upon our commerce and industry.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. At the present time, with deposits of $47,000,000,000 available to the people, there has been a total loss of only $6,000,000,000, $4,000,000,000 of which has been or will be recovered.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. When the gentleman speaks of a loss of $2,000,000,000 to depositors, can he state what the loss was to the stockholders in those banks?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I am unable to give the gentleman that figure. They were in a sense the bankers.

Mr. PIERCE. Does not the gentleman overlook, more than any other fact, the fact that the men in the banking business lost practically their all?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not think that they have lost all. Many of them may have, but I think the total amount of stockholder loss does not compare with the depositor loss.

Mr. PIERCE. But the $2,000,000,000 lost by depositors is only a small part of the loss in the banking business.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. On the contrary, I think it is by far the major part of the loss. I could not now give the gentleman the number of banks that were closed.

Mr. PIERCE. Many of them suffered a loss of 100 percent.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That is true, but I will not agree with the gentleman that it is the major part of the loss. The principal part of the loss has been in the deposits.

Mr. PIERCE. If the gentleman could give us the figures, I think he would find a loss of between three or four billion dollars in the capital structure.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not think it is anywhere near that high. If you had invested in real-estate bonds here in Washington in one of the great properties of the city, the Wardman property, your loss would have been pretty close to 100 percent. If you had invested in 1929 in United States Steel stock, your loss would have been somewhere between $160 and $170 for each $200 that you invested. If you had hoarded your money, if in 1929 you had gone to the bank and said, "I want my $100; I am going to keep it", and if you had kept it until today you would still have your $100, whereas if you had left your money in the average bank in the United States and had suffered the average loss and had received interest at the rate of 2 percent a year for 5 years, you would have had $106.50 for every $100 you had left in the bank. I know of no major line of investment where the record equals that in the banks of the United States. I think that these rather caustic criticisms that the bankers of the country have endured are almost wholly undeserved.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I am a little amazed at the gentleman's statement. It strikes me as far-fetched, but I cannot controvert it because I do not have the figures. Before the gentleman leaves the subject I want to ask him a question. I presume most of the States have double liability in bank stocks, have they not? That is what the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] referred to.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes. Seventeen States do not have such laws at the present time, but I think the remainder or the majority of them do.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. In addition to that, this is where most of the people have their quarrel with the banks. It is not only a case of deposits, but it is the securities that they sold them, and that is where the biggest losses came in.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think the small-town banks of the country were far greater sufferers, proportionately, from the cause to which the gentleman alludes than were the people of the country generally.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I do not agree with that statement. Has the gentleman any figures to back that up?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think it is a fact.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Has the gentleman any statistics on it?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think the small banks of the country were loaded up with a tremendous amount of bonds upon which they lost a great deal of money.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I will agree with that statement, but how did they get loaded up with bonds? Mostly the securities were listed as offerings from the larger banks which disposed of them to the country banks.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I am in accord with the gentleman in his sympathy with the small banker. He carries a tremendous amount of grief and he suffered with his community, but I do not agree that the banking industry did not show losses commensurate with or in proportion to what the public lost, because I believe the heaviest losses which the public experienced were on the securities which the banks unloaded on the investing public.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I am talking about losses in banks. I do not know what the system is in the gentleman's State of Wisconsin——

Mr. SAUTHOFF. It is about the same as all over.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. As far as the banks in the State of Michigan are concerned, they are not engaged in the business of selling securities to their depositors.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. I think what is true in Michigan is true of other places. We have a law which requires the banks to have a certain amount of municipal bonds in their secondary reserves, from which the bankers suffered tremendous losses. They had no way to dodge that issue and were compelled to take them.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. And they were required to take a certain amount of real-estate bonds also, from which they suffered to a greater degree.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that a certain bank in California that has numerous branches throughout the State would instruct the officials of those branch banks to go out and sell the stock of this institution to their leading depositors, and did so to the extent of a great deal of money.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think the Committee on Banking and Currency has done an excellent piece of work in divorcing and separating the business of selling stocks and bonds from the banking business.

Mr. COLDEN. I agree with the gentleman on that point.

TITLE I

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Now, if we may leave that subject, I want to take up a few of the sections of title I. As I said in my introductory statement, feel free to interrupt me at any time regarding the provisions of that title. Unfortunately both titles I and III seem to have been lost in the general argument over title II.

I refer first to section 4 of title I, which makes a major change in the Federal deposit-insurance capital set-up. Heretofore the Corporation has had capital pretty largely supplied by the United States Government, through the Treasury Department.

I do not know whether some of the new Members know it or not, but next to the Treasury Department's contribution of $150,000,000 to the capital, the largest contribution came from the Federal Reserve banks of the country—$139,000,000. The banks themselves, through an assessment of one-quarter of 1 percent under the temporary plan, paid in $39,000,000. Under the present law that capital set-up is changed and it is changed for this reason: It was feared that if we had a considerable loss in the country and if it seemed unwise to assess the banks in time of stress, provision ought to be made for using the assets of the Corporation. This change has been made, and the allotment of resources between capital and surplus is left to the board of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. They may, if they desire, and they probably will, greatly reduce the amount of capital and greatly increase the amount of surplus, for the reason that it would look bad to take money out of the capital of the Corporation, and they want to arrange things so that in times of stress it will not be necessary to deplete the capital of the Corporation.

Section 6 contains a matter which will prove of considerable controversy in this House when the bill is read for amendment. It is the section which relates to the continuance of nonmember banks in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation after 1936.

If anyone has any question as to what that section contains, I will be glad to answer it now. I am going to discuss the matter from the standpoint of the argument later.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman give the House any information as to the proportion of member banks to nonmember banks of the country, to see how many banks will be affected by this provision?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. If I am wrong, I am sure some member of the committee will correct me, but, roughly speaking, there are about 960 State member banks of the Federal Reserve. I believe about 11,000 nonmember banks.

Mr. STEAGALL. Nine hundred and sixty member banks and about 11,000 nonmember banks, and all but 1,100 are members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Of course, there are about 5,600 national banks that are members, by requirement of law, of the Federal Reserve System.

Title I, section 7, contains a provision and a change made by the committee, which I consider of considerable importance. It is probable that there will be some effort made to make some changes in that respect. I think it illustrates the attitude that many of us on the committee have with reference to control by State authorities and control by the Federal Reserve authorities. Under section 7, page 11, of the bill, for admission to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation the bases upon which the Corporation shall make its determination are the condition of the bank and the adequacy of its capital structure. The committee, by a considerable majority, voted out of the bill as originally presented, these requirements: First, future earning prospects; second, general character of management; third, condition and needs of the community; fourth, corporate powers.

The reason those were stricken out was because we feel that as long as we have a dual banking system in the United States, the question of chartering State banks, the determination of whether or not a community ought to have a State bank, and the general character of its management are matters for the State authorities to determine.

The important things to the Insurance Corporation are the financial condition of the bank and the adequacy of its capital. I was among those who felt that we ought to leave the matter of chartering banks to the State authorities as long as we have a dual system. I, for one, say right here, although I believe I am in a minority, I am for a unified system; but until the time comes when we have such a system throughout the country, the matter of determining whether a community ought to have a bank should remain with the State banking authority and not be vested in the F. D. I. C.

Many of the Members who have spoken on the bill have touched upon the subject of assessment. I think my views differ very little from those of the gentlemen who have spoken with reference to this matter. As originally presented to us, the recommendation was that the assessment should be one-twelfth of 1 percent. This, Mr. Chairman, is the recommendation of the Federal Deposit authorities, based upon the experience of the past year. The testimony of Mr. Crowley, the Chairman of the Board, shows that one-third of 1 percent per annum annually assessed would have cared for all the losses in the past 70 years in the banks of the country. I may say, however, that those who have discussed this matter have neglected to say that this experience is based upon national banks, because the figures for State banks prior to about 1900 were not available, and no accurate figures were available until the establishment of the Federal Reserve System. One-eighth of 1 percent would have taken care of all the losses in the national banks of the country except during the last 4 years. One-tenth of 1 percent would have taken care of all the losses of $5,000 or under for the past 70 years, with the exception of the years of the depression.

The committee, after considerable discussion, compromised upon a rate of one-eighth of 1 percent.

Under the law as originally introduced and before the committee changed it the Corporation had the right to remit a part of its assessment. So far they have not taken in more than one-half the amount they are entitled to receive.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. In view of the fact that the capital of the average bank is at the lowest figure it has been for many years, does the gentleman think it would be wise to reduce the assessment from one-eighth of 1 percent to one-tenth of 1 percent, based upon the information the gentleman has with respect to losses during the past decade?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman embarrasses me in asking that question, because I moved in the committee that the amount be fixed at one-tenth of 1 percent; and, as usual, I was defeated.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. In other words, the committee would not accept the gentleman's sound judgment.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for his complimentary contribution.

Mr. Chairman, I have the feeling that the figure of one-eighth of 1 percent is not excessive; I believe we could get along with less than that. I certainly feel that we cannot permanently continue to assess banks one-eighth of 1 percent, because at the rate of the Corporation's earnings and at the rate of their collections by way of assessments, if more banks come into the System, and if deposits increase, the Corporation in the matter of 10 or 15 years would have most of the money of the country. So it seems to me that a limitation must be placed on the amount of the assessment. I am frank to say I think it most unfortunate that we have taken out of the law the right of the Corporation to remit assessments. By the pending bill they are made absolutely mandatory and must continue until Congress changes the law, if the pending measure is enacted into law.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. While the gentleman is on this subject I would like to have him express his views as to the justice of having the same rate apply equally in all parts of the country. Should not the rates be regional? Are not some sections of the country more apt to have trouble than others? I would like the gentleman's views as to the fairness or unfairness of the larger banks, carrying the larger deposits above $5,000, having to pay a rate just the same whether their deposits are insured or not. These matters are bound to be subjects of controversy.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think that in the Seventy-third Congress the Banking and Currency Committee discussed that subject very thoroughly, much more so than they have done during the present session.

The general answer to the gentleman's arguments is that all of the banks of the country are interested in the solvency of all the banks; that a failure in Massachusetts has its repercussions in California, and a failure in Oregon or in Michigan likewise has its influence in the Southland.

We feel further in the matter of assessments based upon all deposits rather than upon insured deposits that while it is somewhat of a concession to the smaller banks of the country, nevertheless it is a right and proper thing, because the large banks are interested in the solvency of the small banks of the country. This, I believe, is the view of the committee.

Mr. GIFFORD. I knew that would be the gentleman's answer, but it is a matter of great controversy.

I would appreciate the gentleman's comments with reference to the attitude of the Massachusetts savings banks with their deposits of $2,000,000,000, who did not wish to and who did not go into this insurance feature. Their investments are largely local, and they resist the attempt to force them to insure with the rest of the banks of the country.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the committee and the House, whenever legislation affecting the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has been before them, have given special concessions to the mutual savings banks of the northeast section of the country; and we have made it particularly easy for them to come in or to get out, as they see fit.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman realizes that these banks are located in the northeast section of the country; there are few of them in the other portions of the country. The gentleman does not criticize their attitude.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Absolutely not.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman has made the comment I wished to make when he replied to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I would like to observe, however, that no attempt ever has been made to force the savings banks into the Deposit Insurance Corporation.

If the gentleman remembers the history of that proposition, he will remember that the savings banks came and requested that they be brought within this legislation.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman is correct. I think at the present time the number insured is something like 68, although I am not certain of that figure. A large number of them are not in the Corporation.

Mr. STEAGALL. In that connection may I say the gentleman remembers that under the provisions of the bill the Deposit Insurance Corporation Board has authority to fix a different assessment for the different kinds of banks?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes. We have given them special consideration because of their solidity, and I am as proud of that fact as is the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Chairman, the total income of the Corporation based on one-eighth of 1 percent has been variously estimated, but, of course, cannot be accurately determined.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 15 additional minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the return from assessments at one-eighth of 1 percent will be, roughly speaking, $45,000,000 a year. The return from the investments of the Corporation is at the present time $9,000,000 per year, giving them a total income of somewhere between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000.

I suppose everyone in the House understands we are definitely now giving up the original provisions of the first Steagall bill; that is, we are no longer insuring accounts up to $10,000; 75 percent of the accounts between $10,000 and $50,000 and 50 percent of the balance.

The reason for that has been well expressed. Forty-four percent of the deposits of the country, according to figures I obtained from the Corporation yesterday, are $5,000 or less; 56 percent are above $5,000; 98 percent of depositors are covered in full. The total deposits in insured banks as of October 1, 1934, the last available figure, is $37,000,000,000. You will remember I said the total amount of deposits in all banks in the United States at the present time is about $47,000,000,000.

A gentleman during the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] asked about the principle of subrogation and its application in this bill. Because of perhaps the hurried manner in which the first bill was drawn, many of us who ought to have applied ourselves a little closer, overlooked this matter. The situation under the present law is such that the depositor with an account in excess of $5,000 is to a certain extent insuring his own deposit, because the Corporation is subrogated to all the rights of a depositor, no matter how much money he has in the bank, until the Corporation is refunded its money in full. Under the present bill we have made it absolutely clear that the Corporation is entitled to be subrogated only to the amount that it pays to a depositor. I do not think that it could be more clearly expressed than in the statute itself:

> Such subrogation in the case of any closed bank shall include the right to receive the same dividends from the proceeds of the assets of such closed bank and recoveries on account of stockholders' liability as would have been payable to such depositor on a claim for the insured deposit, such depositor retaining his claim for any uninsured portion of his deposit.

Mr. DONDERO. What section is the gentleman reading?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Section 7 on page 27. So that matter, I think, is clearly and definitely disposed of. That is all I shall have to say on the subject of title I.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KENNEY. What would happen in case deposits were insured but insurance of the deposits was not justified? Who would take that loss and how would the assessment be levied?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. A very careful provision has been made in the law protecting the Corporation in this respect. The actual fact, as determined finally by a court, fixes the liability of the Corporation.

Mr. KENNEY. If it was determined that the Corporation made a mistake in insuring the depositors, upon whom would that loss fall?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The loss would fall upon the depositor, if the account was not legally insurable. It would depend on the facts and a determination of a court in the matter.

Mr. KENNEY. In that case who would raise the question? The Corporation?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The Corporation or the depositor.

Mr. KENNEY. If the deposits were insured and under that insurance measure deposits were made and continued to be made in the bank, the gentleman does not mean to say, if it subsequently turned out that these deposits should not have been insured, that the Corporation could recover against the depositors because they had received their money?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That would be solely a question of fact to be presented to the court for determination. I could make no other answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot close my discussion of title I without referring to the excellent work done by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], and I am very happy to say that I can quote from an earlier speech of mine, to express my appreciation of his work.

I was invited to go back to the city of Grand Rapids in June 1934, to address the Michigan Bankers' Association. I know the Members will bear with me if I quote a paragraph from the speech which I made at that time to the Michigan bankers. I then stated:

> I cannot close without paying tribute to the great American who heads my committee. There is no person in the American Congress, I think I can safely say no person in the American Government, who has contributed so much to the new stability of banks in the United States as has HENRY B. STEAGALL, of Alabama. He is a great statesman and a great liberal; one who was far-sighted enough 3 years ago, yea, 12 or 13 years ago, to battle for the formation and the carrying into effect of some system of mutual bank insurance. If his desires had been enacted into law in 1932, it is very likely that the banking debacle of 1932 would not have occurred. The House passed this bill but the Senate did not.

TITLE III

May I now refer briefly to title III, and it is a rather interesting fact that so far no one on the floor of the House has discussed any of the provisions of section III of the act.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not blame the gentleman for not listening to me when I made my address, but I did refer to section III and to the reverse action taken on many things which we did and should not have done.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. May I say to the gentleman that I was so chagrined at interrupting him during his speech, giving both him and the House some false information, that I did not listen to the rest of gentleman's speech, because I was busy checking on myself.

Mr. GIFFORD. I may say to the gentleman, while handing out these bouquets, I have been so overwhelmed by the knowledge of the gentleman from Michigan that when he interrupted me I almost yielded what I thought to be the facts, and the gentleman was very nice about calling me up and stating that he did get his facts confused and that I was right.

While I am on my feet—I do not want to bother the gentleman——

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman certainly is not bothering me. He pleases me.

Mr. GIFFORD. But I would like to ask the gentleman if he will not, in his remarks on title III, discuss a phase of the bill which I did not take up, with respect to the harassment of our people by that phase of the bill whereby a banker, who may be the president or an executive officer of a small bank doing a large business, if he goes outside and borrows money, must tell his own bank exactly why he did it, how much he borrowed, what he gave as security, and bare himself to the gaze of all his neighbors in his own little bank. We have gone so far with respect to some of these things that I mention it to the gentleman from Michigan; and when we come to that point in the bill I should certainly like to offer an amendment so that we may retrace another one of our steps which we have taken in going so far in our attempt to control a few crooked bankers.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I shall be very pleased to comment on that. I am going to mention three of the principal items in title III.

In the first place, title III eliminates double liability of stockholders in national banks. At the present time the law is in an uncertain condition. We provided in the Banking Act of 1933 that double liability should not attach to stocks hereafter issued. This leaves a situation in which some bank stock is liable for double assessment and some bank stock is not. We have clarified that matter—and, I think, in a legal and constitutional manner—by providing that double liability would cease on July 1 of 1937 after public notice had been given to the depositors of the bank 6 months prior to the time when double liability is to be eliminated.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman give us his opinion with respect to making the date July 1, 1936, or, rather, explain to us why it should be July 1, 1937?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I have the feeling that ample notice should be given to the depositing public of the United States, so that there could be absolutely no question, either legally or morally, of the right to eliminate double liability. I think delay until 1937 is beneficial for that reason.

Furthermore, the present structure of the banks, as well as the condition of the country, is such that I feel there is very little necessity for hastening the day by setting it ahead 1 year.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. What would be the situation in case a bank failed to give public notice 6 months prior to the date we fix in this bill?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Double liability would attach to the stock, but any bank may thereafter comply by giving the 6 months' notice.

Mr. DONDERO. Might it not be better to make it uniform and absolute throughout the country by fair publication through the public press?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I may say to the gentleman from Michigan that the opinion of the committee is that there is a contractual relationship between the bank depositor and the bank; and we do not believe that we can, by statute law, without giving ample notice to the depositor, eliminate that liability, and this is the reason for it.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. And I assume it is the gentleman's thought that by delaying action with respect to repeal of double liability for a period of 2 years or more, the banks would be in a position to retire from their surplus of earnings an amount to offset the amount of liability on account of such stock ownership or an amount approaching that point.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I was just coming to that question.

Mr. DOBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DOBBINS. The gentleman spoke of the desirability of a uniform banking system. Does not this plan that is proposed by this bill of allowing some banks to make their stockholders liable doubly to the depositors and others not, as they elect, detract from the plan of a uniform banking system?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman that I cannot conceive of any national banking institution that would not take advantage of the law and eliminate double liability.

Mr. DOBBINS. But it does put that bank in the position of asking its depositors to accept this plan as applying to that bank alone, instead of the United States Congress assuming the responsibility and making it apply to all national banks in the country.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I may be wrong from a legal standpoint, but many other lawyers on the committee and the Comptroller of the Currency feel as I do, that because of the contractual relationship between the depositor and the bank, which is the relationship of debtor and creditor, we cannot take any of the rights away from that creditor without giving him ample notice, and I believe this is necessary.

Mr. DOBBINS. But you would notify the depositor if you passed this law, and if he allowed his deposit to remain in the bank after the date you fixed, he would have his legal notice upon enactment of the law.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I doubt whether that would be considered sufficient notice. This is my own view of it.

Section 314 of title III is corollary to the elimination of double liability. It provides that one-tenth of the net earnings of the bank each year shall be carried to surplus until the surplus shall equal the capital; in other words, a one-hundred-thousand-dollar bank must take one-tenth of its annual earnings and add them to surplus until the surplus equals the sum of $200,000; that is, the surplus and capital.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. In the matter of loans to executive officers, which was discussed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD], I may say that we have made a substantial change.

Under the law as it now exists, no loans could be made to executive officers of national banks. I am in thorough accord with the present law; I think it should be continued; but it was felt that it might cause hardship at some time, that emergencies might arise when an executive officer of a bank needed money quickly, and it was decided to place a limitation of $2,500 upon his right to borrow and the further limitation that such loans could only be authorized by a majority of the board of directors-elect.

The provision to which the gentleman refers and to which he particularly objects is that all executive officers of banks are required to notify the board of the bank of which he is an executive officer of the fact that he is borrowing money elsewhere.

I myself felt that if the executive officer was not indebted to his bank that there was no reason for requiring him to give that information. But since we have changed the law to enable him to borrow the sum of $2,500, I believe it is right and proper that notice should be given to his board of the fact of his indebtedness elsewhere.

The contention of the Deputy Comptroller of the Currency, who testified with respect to that matter, is that it is a mighty good thing for the bank to know the condition of its executive officers with respect to indebtedness to other banks.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. Suppose the officer borrowing from his own bank gives 100-percent collateral security. Does the gentleman think he should be compelled to give that information?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I made that suggestion in the committee, but it was not assented to. We have also extended the time for payment of existing loans to executives from July 1, 1935, to 1938.

Mr. DONDERO. I am in sympathy with cutting down the amount that an executive can borrow from his own bank, for that has made a lot of trouble in this country.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Now, I would like to take the time if I had it to discuss a matter which will be an issue in the House when the bill is read for amendment, but I am not going to take the time other than to state my position. Although I am usually in accord with the committee, I am compelled here to disagree. I feel that every effort should be made to bring nonmember banks into the national system. I believe that they possess a greater solidity when they are members of the Federal Reserve System.

I call your attention to the fact that if we repeal the limitation requiring them to become members of the Federal Reserve System by July 1, 1936, we are bringing about a situation where the smaller banks of the country—the smaller national banks of the country are going to go out of the Federal Reserve System.

Any national bank can liquidate, take out a State charter and enter into the F. D. I. C. as a nonmember bank.

What is the situation? By Executive order of the President the right to issue money equivalent to the capital stock of the bank has been taken away. The right to establish branch banks does not exist for the smaller national banks. It does exist in most State banks. By remaining in the national system the small national banks cannot do it.

The rediscount privilege in the Federal Reserve System does not mean much to the small-town banks. They do not have to remain in the Federal Reserve System to remain in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. There is every reason for the small national bank to get out of the System if the bill as we now have it becomes the law of the country.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. If a bank is in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, it gets quite as drastic examinations and the control is quite equal to that in the Federal Reserve? Is not that so?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think in some States it is, but I think in the majority it is not. As far as F. D. I. C. examinations are concerned, we have had but little experience.

Mr. FIESINGER. I have always been of the idea that I would like to see all banks in the Federal Reserve, but now that we have the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation with their examination and methods of liquidation, I cannot see the same reason for having them all in the Federal Reserve.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think there is considerable in what the gentleman says, but so far there has been no considerable system of examination set up, and I will say that the record of the Comptroller's Department in the examination of banks is I think——

Mr. FIESINGER. Much stronger than the F. D. I. C.?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. We have not had much experience with the F. D. I. C., but the Comptroller's record is splendid.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. How often do deposit examinations come?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. With member banks?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. At least once a year.

Mr. PIERCE. And with the Federal Reserve?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Once a year, and the Comptroller's is twice a year, in nationals, and more often if conditions warrant it. To give you some idea of the difference in the record of member and nonmember banks, let me give you these figures: In 1921 there were 8,150 national banks with total deposits of $12,991,000,000. There were 1,595 member State banks with deposits of $7,646,000,000. There were 20,181 nonmember banks with deposits of $9,529,000,000. In 1932 open national banks had diminished in number from 8,150, 12 years before, to 6,080; the State member banks from 1,595 to 824; and nonmember banks from 20,181 to 11,292. During the 12-year period just before the abnormal situation of 1933, the average annual number of national banks closing per year was 138, or 1.6 percent of the 1921 total; State member banks, 35 per year, or 2.2 percent; and nonmember banks, 732 per year, or 3.6 percent—more than twice as much, expressed in percentage, as the national banks. In the matter of deposits, the 12-year period shows that the total deposits in national banks suspended was $1,187,000,000; in State member banks, $680,000,000; and in nonmember banks, $3,017,000,000.

When one stops to consider that the 1932 member banks' deposits were three and one-half times the nonmember deposits, and that the deposits in suspended nonmember banks for the 12 preceding years were practically twice the amount of deposits in suspended member banks, it is plain and apparent that a unified system is immensely superior in safety to depositors. You get some idea from these figures of the superior safety of banks that were members of the Federal Reserve System. That record is borne out by the record of failures in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] stated the other day that the first bank to fail after the inauguration of the F. D. I. C. was in his congressional district. I asked him at that time whether or not it was a member bank. He said that he thought it was. I have found out since that it was a nonmember bank. We have had 16 failures in the Federal Deposit Insurance System up to the day before yesterday. Two of them have been members of the Federal Reserve and 14 of them have been nonmembers of the Federal Reserve System. Taking the total amount of deposits, the figures are even more astounding. The 14 nonmember banks failed with total deposit liabilities of $3,000,000, and the 2 member banks failed with total deposits of $360,000.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Does not the gentleman realize the fact that 14 nonmember banks failed as against 2 member banks shows that those banks that are members of the Federal Reserve System, when in need, usually get it from other member banks, and thereby their closing is prevented, whereas these nonmember banks have nowhere to go for help?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think that has much to do with it. In the State of Michigan in 1932–33 over 40 nonmember banks failed, not because of bad management, not because of the decline in securities, although that was tremendous, but because they had their reserves in suspended banks in the city of Detroit, and if those country banks had had their reserves in the Federal Reserve bank, either the branch bank in Detroit or in Chicago, they would have been open today.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. COLDEN. Does not the gentleman feel that the elimination of the interest payable by the banks to commercial depositors and the release of the double liability of stockholders and of the extension of the executives to borrow money from a bank, to some extent infringes upon the rights of the depositors of those banks? Perhaps I had better call it "custom."

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. It is a contractual obligation. He does not need to enter into a contract with the bank to carry his money if he does not want to. The courts have many times held that it is a relationship of debtor and creditor.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Speaking of the Michigan situation, the 40 banks which closed were mostly small banks.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. DONDERO. And is it not a fact that they were required to have their reserve deposits in the larger banks by law?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. By State law; yes; but not by national law.

Mr. DONDERO. That is true.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. I was just wondering whether the gentleman had considered this proposition: It seems to me there could be too much strictness in examinations. Of course, I believe in safe banking, but it can be made so strict that the bankers get scared and they will not take any risk. That is a difficulty I have found. Of course, that retards business. If a banker will not take some slight risk, a business man cannot get money when it is reasonable to do so.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Of course, we must remember the banker is dealing with other people's money. I feel that the record of the Comptroller's office in the matter of examinations is an excellent one. I do not believe it is too drastic. Like others I think they have made mistakes in the past, but I think it is one of the most highly efficient organizations we have in the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include at this point in my remarks some statistics from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation regarding the failure of banks since the establishment of the Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[4] Reorganization pending Apr. 15, 1935.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Let me conclude this part of my statement by saying that aside from insurance, if your money was in a member bank of the Federal Reserve, your chance of getting it back was about as 300,000 is to 1. If your money was in a nonmember bank, it was about as 1,500 is to 1. In other words, the percentage of safety, if we may call it so, was 200 times greater in member banks of the Federal Reserve than in the nonmember banks.

In the discussion of this question many have talked about borrowers and about bankers, but we must remember that the greatest obligation of a bank is to its depositors, and safety there is the end we seek.

TITLE II

I want to briefly touch upon title II of the bill. I think the argument made by the minority members of the Committee on Banking and Currency in the report 742 is the best argument that can possibly be made against title II. The ranking minority member, Mr. HOLLISTER, ably assisted by the other Republicans on the committee, has made a splendid argument against title II, and there have been many able arguments on the floor.

I want to call your attention in that respect to this: Every argument they make is based not upon the use of the powers that we have given in this bill to the Federal Reserve Board but upon the abuse of those powers. I think it is conceivable that General MacArthur, when they are having a parade with their guns and artillery, might suddenly turn upon the Capitol of the United States or the White House and take it.

I think he would have the power to do that, and perhaps get away with it for a short time, but no one thinks that we should deny the Commander in Chief, the general in charge, and the Army the power to do it because of the remote possibility suggested. I think the Legislature of my State of Michigan could abolish the law against murder, but it is not going to do it. No one thinks that the Federal Reserve Board is going to raise the reserve requirements of banks to the absurd amount of 90 or 100 percent of their deposits. No one believes that. The people of the United States have given the Congress power to do many things. Perhaps we do many foolish things, but the sober sense of the Representatives here keeps this body pretty straight. The same would be true of the Federal Reserve Board. However, let us assume that they would go the limit in this matter of the financing of Government obligations, the most money that could possibly be obtained from the Federal Reserve banks under present conditions by any open-market policy under this bill in the purchase of Government bonds would be approximately the sum of $15,000,000,000, about half of our total issue. At the present time the Federal Reserve banks have but two and a half billion dollars. The great bulk of the money is held by the investing public and by the banks of the country which go into the open market freely and buy those obligations. There is no danger at the present time. No member or nonmember bank in the country could be compelled to buy a bond or make a loan under this bill.

The Under Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Coolidge, said to us in substance that there is no danger that those powers could be used or are needed for the purpose of financing Government obligations.

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. THOM. How did the gentleman arrive at the figure of $15,000,000,000 as the total amount of bonds that could be purchased?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The total amount of assets of the Federal Reserve banks are such at the present time, I am reliably informed, that such a sum could be raised if it was necessary.

We must assume that powers given will be exercised reasonably. But do not forget that this bill contains a distinct and definite direction to the Board. It is found on page 51 of the bill:

> It shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise such powers as it possesses in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to business stability and to mitigate by its influence unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action and credit administration.

This is a distinct limitation on the power. A great raising or lowering of the discount rate, an extensive and unwarranted buying of Government bonds, cannot be tolerated under this section. Stability is the test. If this direction is followed and it is a part of the law, there need be no fear of the abuses which are the bases of the argument of the opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to refer to the circular which all of you received this morning from the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. I am going to read to you what they say about banking legislation:

> With the elimination from the pending bill of the provisions of title II, which we so earnestly believe should not be enacted, there would remain in the proposed Banking Act of 1935 the sections relating to insurance of bank deposits (contained in title I) and the sections that relate to a number of technical changes of banking law (contained in title III). The subject matter of the deposit-insurance provisions and of the technical amendments, having been evolved by officials of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency in consultation with men of practical experience in banking and in business, are based upon demonstrated needs. The adoption of these provisions of the bill, with such minor modifications as congressional investigation may warrant, is recommended.

In other words, they are willing that this legislation should come from the administrative departments of the Government, aided and abetted by the business and banking interests of the country, and they generously leave to us the adoption of such minor modifications as congressional investigation may warrant.

Let me say to the Members of this House that I have the highest respect for the present officials of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, for the present officials of the Federal Reserve Board, and for those in the Comptroller's office, but the substance of much of this bill comes from the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives; Federal deposit insurance originated there. It is our measure, not theirs. It is not the result of 1 year's work. It is the experience of many. I think the time has come, Mr. Chairman, although many may not agree with me, that we ought not to have too much executive interference in matters of legislation. [Applause.] The House of Representatives and Senate ought to do the legislating. It seems, however, in many instances that the situation has gotten down to the point where the executive department wants to enact all the laws and, I am sorry to say, we, in the legislative department, seem to want to appoint all the officials. [Laughter.] I think we each ought to get back to our constitutional functions. [Applause.]

I thoroughly believe that the Government should be dominant in the issuance of currency and the control of general national credit conditions. On the other hand I think the individual banks should be dominant in the matter of local credit, aided and assisted in the needs by membership in the Federal Reserve System.

I am in accord with the general provisions of the bill and am very happy to support it.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Does the gentleman believe that we can give an effective national monetary policy so long as half the banks are within the national system and the other half without?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman knows I am in agreement with his views, but I believe that the tremendous size of the national banks and the member banks of the Federal Reserve is such that we can struggle along without bringing the nonmember banks into the System. I thoroughly believe, however, that in the matter of safety to depositors and in the matter of the larger national credit conditions, that it is desirable that the nonmember banks should be brought into the system. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I am going to speak today in a general way about the banking bill and about bankers, but I wish also to point out the psychology behind some of the events that have occurred in Washington within the last few weeks in opposition to the policies of Congress and of the President of the United States.

We had here recently the Southern States Industrial Council and the National Chamber of Commerce and other organizations, such as the American Liberty League, the last of which stands for everything except for liberty. I find that the National Chamber of Commerce and various organizations have come out against this banking bill and nearly everything the President and the party stand for. This fact of itself seems to indicate that the banking bill must be a good one.

I see also where the President of the United States did not like it so very well; and I am mighty glad to see that the President of the United States has new enemies of that kind. Since he has the animus and hatred of the National Chamber of Commerce, I am sure he will do well.

A good way for a person to know how to vote on a bill is to find out what the National Chamber of Commerce wants and then vote against it. This organization and similar organizations fight every administration that tries to do anything of a progressive nature.

It may seem superficial that I should use as an example what I am about to say, but it is important as an example of the numerous lobbies operating in Washington. Recently I was invited to a banquet by John E. Edgerton, of Tennessee, in such pious and sugary language that I smelled a rat. You know, when a man who does not know me pokes his nose into my cotton patch and talks to me about coming to a free barbecue, a banquet, or something like that, I always smell a rat and think of someone trying to get something, to sell worthless real estate, or use me in some way. I am not opposed to all lobbyists. Interests have a right to lobby. But I do not like some of their methods. So I wrote the gentleman a letter, suggesting that I might not appear. I received an equally impolite answer. In any event, knowing at least the meeting would be tiresome, I did not attend. Most of the rest of the southern Members did go and they remained to hear shabby insults of all kinds, as I had expected.

This big-wig organization, a sort of imitation National Chamber of Commerce, was here for no other purpose than to destroy the new deal, to raise up sectional prejudices and hate, to destroy the policies of the President and of the Democratic Party. This organization and others have sent forth a holocaust of propaganda lately, and it is about time we took our stand against them and stand up for ourselves and our policies. If you look through the newspaper files and through recorded history back to the War of 1812—yes; back to the Revolutionary War—you will find that these same kinds of groups have always been against progressive measures.

I want to talk to you now, however, about the Southern States Industrial Council, just as an example—not that I think Mr. Edgerton and that council amount to anything, but to show some of the practices of the various lobbies and special interests that come to Washington. Under the pretext of southern decency and gentility, on which we southerners pride ourselves, some hundred Congressmen and Senators foregathered and remained to hear the Democratic administration insulted, the President treated derisively, and the Government threatened. It was an absurd, contemptible, vicious, insidious, cowardly, and unfair attack upon the Democratic Party. I would call it nonsense except it was unadulterated knavery.

It was an appeal to prejudice of such a type that would isolate the South from the rest of the Nation, and what we really need in this country is a progressive, unified Democratic Party. [Applause.]

These people in their speeches showed an ignorance of economics, a hatred of labor, and not only a lack of knowledge of the South, but of the North, South, East, and West. I have read all of these speeches. I got them from the newspapermen, and I have talked to the unfortunate men who attended that meeting.

It was a cheap frame-up to get Congressmen before them, to violate all rules of decency and courtesy, and to embarrass our respected Speaker and the Secretary to the President, Marvin McIntyre. I say it was cowardly, because they got up and lectured their guests like school boys and denounced the Democratic Party, the Government, and everything else, and fed them food and did not give them a chance to talk back.

Mr. Chairman, let us go lately into the record of John E. Edgerton.

In the Daily Oklahoman on October 17, 1934, and this was just before the election, the headlines say:

New deal hit as socialistic.

In the Oklahoma News of the same day, he says:

The speaker declared Government has made greater steps toward a socialistic or communistic state under the new deal than in all entire history.

That gets the Democrats, and I suppose that will please Republicans, but let us go back to what he says about the Republicans and the Government, because while the Republicans were managing or mismanaging the Government, whichever it was, back in 1927, he thought the Republicans were a little too progressive.

Mr. BOILEAU. When was that that the Republicans were too progressive?

Mr. MAVERICK. I refuse to yield except to say he thought they were progressive. I did not say they were progressive.

He said concerning the governmental practices, of course proceeding from Congress, that they were not "merely unfair" but "positively dishonest." He must have thought the Republicans were too progressive under Hoover, and certainly thinks the Democrats are worse. Of course, I think we Democrats are a great deal better.

Going on further with Mr. Edgerton, he said in August 1934 that it was "unfortunate the Government has issued a commitment that no one shall go hungry in this country." In other words, he commits himself to the policy that we shall have no relief, and that people should be allowed to starve. At another time he extended this by saying that there should be no security of any sort, except by "virtues and habits." Presumably, those who are unemployed have no virtues, and their habits are such that they deserve no help.

At another time, he emitted various and sundry statements concerning the open shop, which, properly interpreted, showed he was not only antilabor, but that labor should be boycotted.

To sum up: Before he ever issued this call to the congressional delegations of the South, he was shown to be violently against the new deal; that it was socialistic and communistic; that the Government is dishonest; that people should have no relief; and that he was antilabor. This pious faker, who has prayer meetings in his plants, essayed to invite the Members of Congress, whom he had previously maligned.

Anyhow, the meeting was held. Here is one of the headlines from the Washington Post of Tuesday, April 30:

Southerners voice views of new deal. Policies both assailed and faintly praised at D. C. dinner. Efforts to drive U. S. into state socialism charged by Hall.

This newspaper article should be read to be appreciated, but it showed that the administration was bitterly denounced in the presence of Speaker Byrns and Marvin McIntyre; a speaker named Hall bellowed that Government should "get out and stay out of business"—a misleading statement—adding in contemptuous tones:

God knows, we can make a better job of it than those in the Federal Government.

Then he said:

We expect to maintain the labor differential, N. R. A. or no N. R. A.

Also he said, with utmost contempt, to the assembled delegates:

It doesn't make any difference what Congress does, there are certain problems which we will solve precisely as we wish.

Another paper indicates that along with this was brought in the antilynching bill, and any reasonable person can deduct from this and from plain words that, unless the law suited this aggregation, they would violate it. Of course, the antilynching bill has nothing to do with other bills; it was only to stir up prejudice. But it was what they say the Communists propose to do:

To overthrow the Government by force and violence.

This makes them much worse than Communists, because Communists are not supposed to know anything and are "mostly foreigners", whereas, according to the statements of the speakers, they are of pure blood, pure Anglo-Saxon stock, and have one God, one country, and one flag.

So these people announced in advance that they will not obey a law if it is passed by Congress. They arrogate to themselves a certain section of the country in which they state the laws of the United States will not be in force, "N. R. A. or no N. R. A." They want laws enforced against Massachusetts, against California, but they, claiming to be southern aristocrats, will refuse to obey the laws of the United States and continue to exploit their people. I say again, what we Democrats need is a unified party, where the North, the South, East, and West understand each other. And it is up to us; we must do something, or we will fail. We must adopt and carry out economic policies, and we must separate the sheep from the goats; that is, the friends from the enemies, and do our duty in a courageous manner.

Here are the headlines of the Washington Daily News of Tuesday, April 30, 1935:

Speakers denounce administration at industrial dinner. Southern Congressmen cheer attacks on Government; approve plea for "more babies."

Get the article and read it. It is by a very able reporter, Mr. Charter Heslep, and reads partially as follows:

The new aristocracy of the South spoke its mind on the new deal in plain words here last night and turned thumbs down on "planned economy" and "Federal usurpation of power."

Sandwiched between loudly applauded demands that Government "get out and stay out of private business" was the plea for "more babies in the South" to perpetuate the "finest Anglo-Saxon stock in the Nation."

The forum was a dinner tendered 150 Senators and Congressmen from 14 Southern States by the Southern States Industrial Council. At the speakers' table sat Speaker JOSEPH W. BYRNS, whose shaggy eyebrows edged closer to each other as various administration enterprises were denounced. Marvin McIntyre, of President Roosevelt's secretariat, sat near him * * * as speakers drove home thrusts at the N. R. A., Government ownership of railroads, the Wagner labor bill, the Guffey coal bill, the new banking bill, the Wagner-Costigan antilynching bill.

These words, of course, need no interpretation; but it is very plainly for the purpose of working up the South as against the North and to tie in the lynching bill with the progressive measures of the new deal. I do not care how anybody votes on any of these bills; but what are we to do, scuttle our program by virtue of a combination of prejudices imposed upon us by the Southern States Industrial Council? I was looking at a history book the other day, and I found that a similar crowd fought Andrew Jackson. They called themselves "chambers of commerce and manufacturers' associations", and they fought him because he was fighting for the rights of the American people and curbing old Nicholas Biddle, the banker. If we go into this matter historically, we find a group of people always fighting progressive measures. Let us of the South not be moved from our path of progress, and let us realize that the future of this Nation depends upon a unified Democratic Party.

Time is scarce, but let me say a few things about the speech of Mr. Edgerton, which is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Tuesday, April 30, 1935, placed in the RECORD by unanimous consent of the House by Mr. MAY, of Kentucky.

Mr. Edgerton's speech was a clever one, indeed, and, although he did not mention my name, I got several left-handed compliments, but these I shall pass. He is an able speaker. He referred in his speech to "hospitality and good fellowship" and then proceeded to insult all those present and referred to the banquet in which he used the words "the cost of this philanthropic gesture." On this statement, whatever conclusions one cares to make can be drawn.

He then waded into great gobs of false sentimentality, principally designed to appeal to southern prejudices, mentioning "religious instincts" and "the pride of ancestry", and then, to take a crack at the President, he referred to George Washington as being "the greatest 'brain trust' that ever came together." And I should like for you to think over the insidiousness of that remark.

He talked for solid minutes after minutes, calling on God, God Almighty, and Christian civilization time after time, which makes me think that there are religiopolitical demagogues and politicoreligious demagogues, and one is as bad as another.

I have found that people who are continuously talking about religion in reference to their business are not so religious. In fact, such people talk religion, but they do not practice it. I long ago found out that when a man claims to be religious and blats about it in the newspapers and in public, that he is not so religious; and when a man claims to be honest, you had better watch out. In other words, these gentlemen might consider practicing religion instead of talking about it.

He thanked God Almighty that one of the Presidents was of "southern birth, breeding, and habits of mind and soul"—another slap at Mr. Roosevelt. Then, more insults for those who did not happen to come from the South and more aspersions on the President. More references to "academicians and agitators." Then, in sonorous phrases, he insisted that the Congressmen "do your full duty." More about Karl Marx, Lenin, and then, as a direct slap at the administration, he said:

> We of the rank and file in the South do not believe that there is anything of such unusual character in this latest emergency as to justify or call for deliberate contraventions or circumventions of the American Constitution or other radical departures from established customs in treating extraordinary conditions. We cannot reconcile so-called "planned economies" to our peculiar system of government.

He then quoted something Roosevelt had said 5 years ago, and sarcastically remarked that it is as true now as 5 years ago, and then proceeded to state that if he were a Member of Congress he would do so and so.

He then said:

> But there are one or two other vital questions about which the South is particularly concerned in these troublous times. Our section constitutes the largest area within the borders of the United States in which practically all of the people are of one blood, of one language, of one God, and of one basic philosophy of life.

This last-quoted paragraph is, of course, nonsense; and though I hate to bring it up, we have a problem in the South which is a racial one, because in many places the Negro population is 30 to 60 percent, so this was merely an appeal to prejudice.

The rest of his speech was devoted mostly to talking about communistic and socialistic philosophy, strong intimations that the South will not obey laws which they do not like, asking for special privileges to none, except that he have wide wage differentials as a tariff against the North, and then ended up with these casuistic phrases:

> Clearly, the legislative end of this gigantic responsibility rests largely upon the sturdy shoulders of our southern representation in the Congress. Certainly, no shoulders ever carried a heavier burden, and it is one that obviously cannot be honorably transferred to other shoulders.

It would be dishonorable, I presume, to put power in the hands of northern or western Democrats or even to let them think. This last appeal could only be used to appeal to the South's sectional prejudices, to cleave us away from the party, and to break the party and make it possible for the groups and special interests to keep the American people divided, and thereby never recover out of this depression.

Another speaker, Hon. David R. Coker, of South Carolina, spoke like a gentleman and in not an unfriendly way. He, however, mentioned the fact that the South must have a much wider wage differential, and intimated that there was no sense in paying wages from 17 to 30 cents when you could get all the workers you wanted for 10 to 12½ cents an hour. However, it might be said that Mr. Coker made an honest speech, in rather plain and decent language, and his speech is worth reading. He, in fact, made some good suggestions about the cotton industry.

Then came Harvey Couch, of holding-company fame, who delivered a panegyric on big families, but who made a statement insinuating the greatness of holding companies and electric-power companies and, by implication at least, intending to show that the power commission report on the status of the electric industry, and done through Congress, is false. It was intended to put the delegation fast asleep and to prejudice them against the holding-company bill and the T. V. A. and the progressive policies of the President.

Then came the star of the evening, Fitzgerald Hall, of the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway, and it was a fine, honest, and thoroughly insulting speech. He referred to the railroad situation as an "El Dorado" for politicians, with implications of graft, crookedness, and inefficiency, and then he mostly had the idea that everything else should be regulated out of business and make it so he could have an unrestrained monopoly to do what he pleases. And then he says:

> When we compare the way the average business is run with the way the Federal Government is run, I am convinced that the taxpayers prefer for business men to run business and for the Federal Government to get out of business, stay out, and attend to its constitutional functions, instead of trying to regulate the lives of its citizens from the cradle to the grave.

This class of people who are always cursing the Government, and who are worse than Communists in doing it, are down begging for money from the R. F. C. and getting money out of the R. F. C., which money, of course, comes from the taxpayers of the United States. After they get their money and get on their feet, they with utter ungraciousness attack the hand that feeds them. The truth of the matter is they want the R. F. C. to feed them money and to regulate everybody else out of business so that they can have an unrestricted field to do as they please in monopolistic practices.

Mr. Chairman, I have several ideas on this. One of them is that which I brought out in the first place—that when I am invited as a guest I expect to be treated as one, and this was a great example of bad manners. It was not a good example, I think, of southern chivalry. There is only one thing worse than a Yankee carpetbagger, and that is a southern carpetbagger; and now these southern carpetbaggers, these clumsy Tories, with none of the charm of the old Tories, come into Washington and, with blatancy, bad manners, and a disregard for all the social amenities, burst in among us.

If we stand for this and let them get away with it, the people are going to go to HUEY LONG, and this same outfit will probably finance him to help break up the Democratic Party and thus, with Roosevelt in the middle, they hope to get back a Republican reactionary.

These people have an absolute contempt for working people. They say they do not believe in Government regulation, but want Government regulation for their own benefit or special interests; they praise southern aristocracy, and so on. The same class of people are always talking about "poor white trash." This is a cruel type of language, but I must say this—that whenever a man claims to be a southern aristocrat, you can count on it that he is "poor white trash." And, as far as that is concerned, we ought not to have any "poor white trash." Everybody ought to have a chance to make a decent living, and that is what the Democratic Party should stand for.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud to have come from the South. I am proud of my people, and I am proud of their patriotic services to this Nation. It is a grand place to live, and good people live there—but the Civil War is over, and good people live everywhere else. But I must say this: Although these "aristocrats", who have claimed to be aristocrats, are only pseudo-aristocrats, I do not believe that we ought to have any aristocrats running this country. I propose, Mr. Chairman, that we have an aristocracy, but that it be an aristocracy of courage, of manhood, of intellect, and of honor. An aristocracy of courage, I say, which has nerve enough to tell the reactionaries to "go to hell"; an aristocracy of courage which is willing to fight for its principles; an aristocracy of courage which is liberal, progressive, thoughtful, kindly, decent, and which has a feeling for the people of the United States. Only in that way can we come out of this depression.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, we have certain things that we must do. There are certain criticisms of the Democratic Party which are well founded. We must develop an economic philosophy, a balance of economic principles, and we must fight for those things, and we must demand that they go through and not be deflected by a group of selfish men, who represent only the special interests and their desire to make a profit.

The following is an editorial appearing in all the Scripps-Howard papers, which will explain some of the matter:

[From the Cleveland Press of Apr. 9, 1935]

A GOOD STEAK

Representative MAURY MAVERICK, like the unbranded steers his grandfather used to send roaming the great Southwest, thinks the lone "pa-ra-rie" a safer place for a man than a soft-carpeted caravanserai in Washington. Responding to a dinner invitation sent by the Southern States Industrial Council, the young Texan said he would come if he could pay for his own meal. The council's president was deeply offended that Maury saw anything sinister in so innocent a thing as a bid to dinner.

"We deplore", he wrote the Congressman, "the implication that it is an unsafe thing for a Member of Congress to expose himself to the influence of a good steak and the information which he often gets in connection therewith, even though they cost him nothing except his time which is presumed to be worth more than the best dinner."

Mr. MAVERICK's Chesterfieldian comment to this was: "Phooey!"

Without questioning his would-be host's motives it can be said that the Texas Congressman's instinct is sound. Propaganda sifted through soft lights, laughter, and music is ever so much more convincing. The subtle half-tones of dinner conversation are more persuasive than logic in the daylight. Many a man who could not be bought for millions has been tempted by a good steak.

A résumé of the incident might be shown briefly as follows:

THE SAGA OF THE STEAK, OR THE STORY OF THE CHICKEN THAT CROWED TOO SOON

THE WHITE LETTER [1]

Letter by the Honorable John E. Edgerton to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] inviting him to a grand "social" affair to be given under the aegis of the Southern States Industrial Council.

THE SMELLED RAT

Mr. MAVERICK smells a rat and does not accept, writing a letter to Mr. Edgerton.

ANOTHER WHITE LETTER [1]

Edgerton expresses his purity of his intentions, calls MAVERICK a "freshman", suggests it is only a social affair, and cannot understand why a Congressman refuses a "free steak."

THE NOBLE RECORD OF BROTHER EDGERTON

Enemy of all labor, calling his employees to prayer before miserable exploitation; "new deal socialistic, communistic", and Government "dishonest"; Government should revoke "unfortunate official commitment that no one shall go hungry in this country."

BANQUET OF THE SOUTHERN STATES INDUSTRIAL COUNCIL

It was: Tiresome—Pious flub-dub—Too long—Insulting to the President and Congress—An attack on the Government—An appeal to passion and prejudice.

Main purposes indicated by speakers: Exploitation of labor—Wide-wage differential (lower) for their labor—To destroy the Democratic Party—To raise sectional hate of the South against rest of Nation; to "divide and destroy"—To make money in violation of the laws of economics and fair play—Violation of all laws not desired—Killing of T. V. A. and holding-company bills by sweet insinuations—Labor for 10 cents an hour (figuring $4 per 40-hour week), for which a "Southerner of pure blood, one God, one flag, one country" is to rear family, educate children, eat, and live in idle luxury and indolence, ride in Rolls-Royces, and lay around drinking choice southern mint-juleps.

FINIS

There was no steak (although promised)—only chicken! But the mystic chicken had crowed too soon. Guests went home bored to death. And thus ungrandiloquently did fall, and burst like a dud, one of Washington's most asinine lobbies.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH].

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to speak at length on this measure, which has been so exhaustively presented by the members of the Banking and Currency Committee. In its consideration, however, I am inevitably carried back to personal experience on the other side of the water in the field of public finance, when the governments of Europe were suffering from the results of monetary inflation.

At the time of the sweeping inflation in Germany which, as the Members will recall, carried the reichsmark to a point where it required a trillion post-inflation marks to equal the preinflation value of a single mark, one of the outstanding factors in the picture was the enormous and repeated purchase by the Reichsbank, the bank of issue in Germany, of obligations of the German Government directly from the German treasury. Currency was provided in this manner as desired by the Government. The Government acted, no doubt, as it believed, in the interest of the nation as a whole. The Reichsbank felt compelled to conform to the policy. The results were disastrous.

Subsequently, during the inflation in France, which carried the value of the franc from a 100-percent basis to a 20-percent basis, the same factor was prominent in the picture. Again, we saw the Bank of France, the bank of issue in France, purchase directly from the treasury and purchase heavily Government obligations in exchange for currency desired by the French Government. The Government acted again, no doubt, as it believed, in the interest of the nation as a whole. The Bank of France felt compelled to conform to the policy. The results are known to all.

After the inflation had run its course, when the time came to gather up the fragments and to try to start anew, steps were taken in both countries to guard against a repetition of this experience. Included in these steps in each country were the divorce of the central banking system and its officials from the political control of the Government, and rigid restrictions upon the acquisition of Government obligations directly from the treasury by the central banks.

The experience of these two nations, Mr. Chairman—the experience of the world, for that matter—emphasizes strongly, to my mind, the importance of a clear line of demarcation between the authority of government, on the one hand, and the authority, on the other hand, of such central banking system as may be maintained for the protection of the people against the perils of unwise monetary control.

We have been told in the course of this debate that there is no democratic country in the world today with a central banking system in which this line of demarcation is not drawn in the interest of the people as a whole. It has been drawn because it has been found through bitter experience that wise central banking control often calls for action in opposition to popular sentiment of the moment. It has been drawn because it has been found that successful control calls for control by experts, free, insofar as it is humanly possible to free them, from the influence of political pressure to which elective officials in every democratic nation of the world are necessarily subject.

In analyzing the bill—and I refer particularly to title II—it seems to me that it carries with it a very real danger for the people of this Nation through an apparent failure to appreciate the importance of the principle to which I have referred.

[1] "Write Letter" indicates the absolute impeccability and purity of the writer, the Honorable John E. Edgerton. Uninformed persons are enjoined to look up the word "impeccability", which has wide connotations.

I fear that if adopted in its present form it will carry us in a direction in opposition to that principle. I fear that if enacted without amendment it will serve to set up in this country machinery very similar to the machinery in France, to the machinery in Germany, at the time to which I have referred.

What does title II provide in its present form? It increases the authority of the President over the Federal Reserve Board. It increases the authority of the Federal Reserve Board over the Federal Reserve banks. It provides for open-market operations, under the direction of the Federal Reserve Board mandatory insofar as the Federal Reserve banks are concerned. The net effect, as I see it, is to place the executive branch of the Government in a position to compel the Reserve banks to support the market for Government obligations, to compel the purchase of Government obligations or obligations guaranteed by the Government to the full extent of available resources. The danger is self-evident. It needs no emphasis in the light of the enormous deficits which we have been incurring each year, and which it appears likely we are to continue to incur for a number of years to come.

The title also delegates to the Federal Reserve Board the power to change requirements as to reserves to be maintained by member banks against demand or time deposits. The effect of this provision in conjunction with others, as I see it, is to place the executive branch of the Government in a position to dictate in large measure the credit policy of the banks, even to the point of compelling them to cease operation. The power could be effectively used, if so desired, in bringing about in large measure the nationalization of banking and credit in the country.

There are other provisions in title II in its present form which seem to be open to objection. The so-called "liberalization of rediscounting requirements", which would permit loans to member banks on their own obligations secured by "any sound asset", the change of requirements in respect to collateral securing Federal Reserve notes to include a first lien on all the assets of the bank, the authorization to member banks to make real-estate loans up to 100 percent of capital and surplus. These and other provisions seem to me to run counter to the experience of the world in respect to sound banking and currency.

Title II in its present form carries with it another great delegation of power to the executive branch of the Government. The constitutionality of that delegation has been questioned. It provides for a further concentration of authority in the executive branch of the Government over the currency, the credit, and the banking structure of the Nation. It presents the temptation to finance budgetary deficits as they were financed in Germany and in France by the issue of bonds to the Reserve System in exchange for notes secured by the bonds issued. It reflects, I think, the theory that the National Economy Act can be effectively regulated by the increase or decrease in the volume of money. It paves the way for further trial and experimentation under that theory.

No one could be satisfied with recent results in the field of central banking in this country. It may well be that a greater concentration of control in respect to the system as a whole is desirable. That control, if accorded, however, should be protected insofar as humanly possible, both from business pressure and political pressure. Experience throughout history indicates that when Government control in the field of credit and currency becomes that of management rather than that of supervision it destroys the safeguards against financial ruin which the people of a nation are entitled to.

I hope that title II will be revised. In the absence of revision I shall feel compelled to vote to strike the title, or important portions of it, from the bill. Further consideration seems to me essential.

A few days ago a brilliant statesman in Great Britain, a former Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Winston Churchill, wrote an article on the new deal and what he described as "the audacious onslaught on the canons of the monetary system."

From afar—

He said—the vast proportion of the American landscape can be surveyed. Sunlight still flashes upon it between the storms. But one has a feeling, insofar as the new deal is concerned, that it is the sunlight of the afternoon. The ardent rank of economic and social crusaders who dominated the American Continent 2 years ago have fallen into perplexity division and we must add recrimination. * * * The atmosphere of disillusion is unmistakable.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that if another storm does break upon us, which God forbid, we shall not have cause to reproach ourselves for failing to take due heed of our own experience and experience in the rest of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, it has been my good fortune to have been a Member of the Banking and Currency Committee since I entered Congress 2 years ago last March. I have spent a great deal of time during these three sessions of Congress in the work of this committee; probably as much time in the work of the committee and in the study of the several important questions that have come before the committee than in all the rest of the work that I have done as a Member of Congress. However, when I compare my own limited experience in the settlement of the difficult and involved questions involved in the regulation of money and banking with the vastly greater experience of several of the other members of the committee, some of whom—notably the chairman, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. STEAGALL, and the ranking majority member, the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH—have devoted many years of hard arduous service to this work, I approach even a brief discussion of this bill with a good deal of humility.

The chairman of our committee, I believe, is generally conceded to have done more than any other Member of either branch of Congress to secure the enactment of that splendid piece of legislation designed for the protection of the great majority of depositors in the banks of this country and the stability and the safety of our banking structure—the Federal insurance of bank deposits. I have a great deal of respect for his judgment in banking and currency matters, as well as admiration for the service that he has given to the country.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] has, as was attested by the two men whom I regard as perhaps the greatest expert authorities on currency in this country, Governor Eccles and former Senator Owen, furnished a great contribution to our sum total of knowledge as to the correct method that the Congress should follow in giving us a sound and adequate currency.

It seems to me that there is nothing that I can add to what they and several other members of this committee have said in this debate regarding title II of this bill. There may, however, be some value in reiteration, although no additional contribution is made.

I am heartily in favor of the main provisions of title II, which carry out nearly in whole the recommendations made by Governor Eccles to the Banking and Currency Committee, and in accordance with the program initiated by the great leader of the American people, Franklin D. Roosevelt, to give us a sound and adequate currency and to place the control of the issue of money and the control of credit, which is at least nine-tenths of our money, in the Government of the United States rather than in the private bankers.

For Congress to exercise its constitutional power to coin money and regulate the value thereof three things are necessary:

First. The control of the interest and discount rate.

Second. The control of the ratio of reserves in the banks to deposits.

Third. The control of open-market operations as carried out by the buying and selling of the bonds and obligations of the Government.

Properly to carry out these three powers they must be vested in one body—a body representing the Government—in order that they may be made, when necessary, uniform and beneficial to the country as a whole, and in order that all or any of them may not be so used in any 1 of the 12 Federal Reserve districts to the detriment of the rest of the country. This bill properly gives these powers to the Federal Reserve Board.

Gentlemen here have attacked this control as being a political control. The only way that it is a political control is that it is control by the Government itself, as representing all of the people, and as between public control and private control, I am for public control. Private control has been tried and found wanting.

I think this bill may not be justly criticized in this respect as going too far. After listening to the several witnesses who appeared before our committee—notably, Governor Eccles and Senator Owen—and after reading and rereading the important parts of the hearing on this bill, some degree of intellectual honesty, which I hope I may be found to possess—however I may be found to be lacking in the expertness in this subject that can come only from experience and long study—compels me to say to this House that I find some of my previous conceptions or prejudices somewhat removed, and I think there may be some ground for saying that this bill, in some respects, does not go far enough. If it were not for the rule of action which I have found in other matters to be most prudent to follow, namely, that we should take only one step at a time, I should say that the Congress ought to follow the advice of Senator Owen and take a position which I believe the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] has long advocated, and direct the Federal Reserve Board in its control of credit to furnish sufficient expansion to keep prices at what may be regarded as a normal level, whether of 1926 or of some level more nearly just to debtors, which in a great sense we all are. It seems to me that the argument in favor of doing that is so sound and conclusive that if that step is not taken at this session of Congress in this bill, it is certainly indicated as one of the steps next to be taken after the control of our currency and monetary policy has been restored to the Congress, where the Constitution directed that it should be.

Of course, this bill in its present form undoubtedly gives the power to the Federal Reserve Board to do this, and I suppose the only thing that may be criticized on this score is that it is, in practical effect, permissive rather than mandatory.

There are some other features of the bill as finally reported by the committee with which, while I do not regard them as of as much importance as I do the issue of public versus private control of our monetary policy, I am not in entire accord.

It seems to me conclusive that our banking history has shown—particularly the history of the 12 years preceding the bank holiday in 1933—that security to our depositors through the soundness of the entire banking structure of the country depends in a large degree upon a unification of the control of the banks of the country. In the passage of the Federal deposit-insurance law as a part of the Banking Act of 1933, and again in the amendments to that act passed in 1934, it was, I believe, generally understood that the nonmember State banks should be given sufficient privileges to enable and induce them gradually, but eventually, to be brought into the Federal Reserve System.

They, of course, wished in 1933 and 1934, and also now in 1935, to participate in the benefits of Federal deposit insurance. Viewed as a matter of public policy, and from the standpoint of affording safety to the depositors, it was entirely fitting and necessary that they should be given such privilege; and so we wrote it into the law that they should be given until a certain date to bring themselves into the Federal Reserve System. That date was later extended and is now, under the present law, July 1, 1937. In order to make the burden of assessment for Federal deposit insurance lighter upon the small nonmember State banks, as well as upon the other small banks, the Congress provided for the building up of the reserves of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation by an assessment upon all the insured banks and by an assessment upon the uninsured, as well as upon the insured deposits. That means, in one sense, that we are making the large banks—the banks which carry a greater proportion of uninsured than insured deposits—carry a part of the burden which would otherwise fall upon those smaller banks which have a larger relative proportion of insured than uninsured deposits. I am in favor of this. I have been in favor of it throughout. Like most of the other members of the committee—both the majority and minority members—I have favored it, despite the opposition of the American Bankers Association and despite the opposition of many of the big banks in my own State. I have not been alarmed, and I am not alarmed now by any blast from the United States Chamber of Commerce directed against any of the provisions of this bill. I recall that the United States Chamber of Commerce, which right now is not quite bold enough to attack Federal deposit insurance, was bitterly opposed to it last year and the year before, as a permanent proposition.

We are providing in this bill for an assessment, namely, one-eighth of 1 percent annually, so long as it may be necessary to build up the reserves of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, upon the total deposit liability of all of the banks that participate in the benefits of the insurance. We all know that practically none of the small banks—except some savings banks—could live without it in competition with banks whose deposits are insured to the limit of $5,000. With that privilege accorded to the small nonmember State banks, I believe there goes a duty, namely, that inasmuch as it is now being made possible, and in fact, comparatively easy for them to qualify to come into the Federal Reserve System, that they should be required to do so. That is the administration program; that was the recommendation made to us by all of the members of the administration who came before our committee. It is a part of the program laid down by the leader of the American people, and in advocating this change in the present bill I say that I am following the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The greater mortality of the nonmember State banks during the 12 years preceding the bank holiday, the vastly greater losses to their depositors in proportion to the total number of deposits than in the member banks, has already been set forth by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] both upon this floor and in his very able supplemental report on this bill. His report, based on the 1933 report of the Federal Reserve Board, shows, among other things, the following: In 1921 there were 8,150 national banks with total deposits of $12,991,000,000.

There were 1,595 member State banks with total deposits of $7,646,000,000. There were 20,181 nonmember banks with deposits of $9,529,000,000. During the 12-year period before 1933 national banks had closed or been suspended with total deposits of $1,187,000,000. State member banks had been closed or suspended with total deposits of $680,000,000. Nonmember banks had been closed or suspended with total deposits of $3,017,000,000. During this same period the average number of national banks closing per year was 138, or 1.6 percent. The average number of State member banks closing per year was 35, or 2.2 percent. The average number of nonmember banks closing per year was 732, or 3.6 percent. The losses, as shown in the total number of deposits, as well as in the total amount of deposits, was far greater in the nonmember State banks than in either the national or member State banks.

This must lead one to see the severe blow to this process of unification of our banking structure in striking out from this bill as originally presented to the committee the provision requiring nonmember banks to come into the Federal Reserve by July 1, 1937, or at some future date, in order to participate in the Federal deposit insurance.

The worst thing about it is that, of course, if the nonmember banks can get all of the benefits without coming into the Federal Reserve System it is altogether likely that a large number of them will remain outside.

With respect to these features of the bill, as well as generally to what has been said regarding the furnishing of banking facilities in all other parts of all of the States of this country, I am in entire accord with my friend, Mr. BROWN of Michigan, and also with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK], and if either of them offers an amendment, as I understand that they will, to replace these features in the bill, I shall support them.

With all due respect to the statements by other members of the committee and to other Members of the House who have talked about taking care of the little bank, I am in agreement with them, and I think this is one of the principal ways of taking care of the small banks; but I think what is more important than taking care of the banks is taking care of the depositors. That is the paramount duty of this Congress with respect to our banking structure.

It was my understanding that the chairman of the committee, who has fought so long and so successfully for Federal insurance of bank deposits would help us to carry this out. I have been in sympathy with the chairman ever since I have been a member of the committee with respect to this effort of his. I have been in agreement with the chairman that the Federal deposit-insurance law should eventually be put into force as it was originally written and should provide for full insurance of deposits up to $10,000 and a partial insurance of the larger deposits. I am fearful that the failure to do this may be found to result in a greater splitting of deposits than would otherwise be done, and that it may conceivably, in some sections, result in a draining off of deposits from the smaller business centers to the greater business commercial centers.

I feel a great sense of humility in opposing my judgment at the present time against the judgment of the chairman—if indeed it is his judgment—but I feel justified in doing so because I regard it as a part of my duty in upholding the well-planned administration program and because it is my understanding that the position which I am now taking is the position which was formerly taken by the gentleman himself. Therefore, I urge the support of such amendments as may be offered to carry out the recommendations in the supplemental report of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], and when that has been settled I know that the gentleman from Michigan, as well as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] and myself, will join with the committee in passing this great constructive measure.

It seems to me conclusive that our banking history has shown, particularly the history of the 12 years preceding the bank holiday in 1933, that security to our depositors through soundness of the entire banking structure of the country depends in a large degree upon a unification of the control of the banks of the country. In the passage of the Federal deposit-insurance law as a part of the Banking Act of 1933, and again in the amendments to that act passed in 1934, I believe it was thoroughly understood that the Congress contemplated—certainly the Committee on Banking and Currency contemplated—a policy of eventually requiring nonmember State banks, in consideration of receiving the benefits of Federal deposit insurance, to be brought into the Federal Reserve System. Nonmember State banks, of course, in 1933 and 1934 wished, and I assume now in 1935 wish, to participate in the benefits of Federal deposit insurance. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] made a very able argument on that question. He has put into the RECORD the very figures which I intended to put into the RECORD, showing the greater mortality of the nonmember State banks during the 12 years preceding 1933, greater mortality, greater number of failures, greater number in total deposits, greater loss in amount of deposits as compared with the total amount of deposits in each of those two classes of banks, and as comparing it with the member State banks. The gentleman from Michigan has made an argument which, to my mind, is unanswerable. If there is an answer to his argument I do not know what it is. It would be merely repetition for me to make at length an argument upon that particular phase of the bill such as I intended to make until I heard the very able speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN]. But while it is reiteration, I want to point out what, of course, every member of the Committee on Banking and Currency knows, but in order that it may not escape the Members of the House if they read the RECORD on this subject, we set a date when we passed the Federal deposit-insurance law as a part of the Banking Act of 1933, and that date was finally extended again last year until July 1, 1937, at which time nonmember State banks were to come into the Federal Reserve System in order that they might continue as participants in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

That provision was in the bill as it was originally presented to the committee. The committee, in its wisdom—by, I believe, a fairly substantial vote, although I do not recall what the vote was—has stricken that from the bill. I think it is fair to say that this bill is one of the major pieces of administration legislation of this session. It is my understanding that the provision so stricken from the bill is a provision which was a part of the administration's program.

I might point out further, that which would not appear in this bill, and I do not know whether it has been mentioned by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] or not, that it was to meet certain arguments and objections raised on behalf of the nonmember State banks, that a recommendation was made to the committee by Governor Eccles—and I thought it was going to be viewed with favor by the committee at that time—that all of the banks that were, at the extended date, July 1, 1937, members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, should be eligible to come into the Federal Reserve System. I am in favor of restoring that provision of the bill. I now understand the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] is going to offer an amendment to restore that. I may say that I find myself in the rather unusual position of agreeing with both the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] at the same time. I want to urge upon the Membership support of the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK]. The news must have leaked out that I was going to speak this afternoon. Otherwise I cannot account for the large number in attendance. I am supporting the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, not because of my high regard for the gentleman, but because I think the gentleman is right. In general, I agree with the supplemental report of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], and I hope that report will be read by the Membership. That was filed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], both on the question of bringing about, as far as possible, a unification of the banking system and also furnishing banking facilities more generally to smaller communities by extending the privileges of branch banking to national banks in the same way as it is to State banks, gradually bringing in nonmember banks.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I am happy to know the gentleman and I are able to agree about this particular amendment. I want to call attention to the fact that the amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time will be to restore section 202 as amended, to the bill, with one exception, changing the date from July 1, 1937, to July 1, 1938, which will give an additional year within which those banks could make the necessary preparation, if they need to make preparation, to come into the system. On that point, if the gentleman will bear with me, I want the Membership of the House to know that under this provision the banks that have issued deferred certificates waiving deposits, which was referred to the other day by our colleague from Illinois, Mr. DIRKSEN, will also be eligible for admission to the Federal Reserve System, and that that fact will in no wise operate against their ability to come in and receive the real benefits which this bill offers to nonmember banks by coming into the Federal Reserve System.

The amendment which I will offer is as follows:

SEC. 202. Section 9 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by inserting after the tenth paragraph thereof the following new paragraph:

Upon application to the Federal Reserve Board at any time prior to July 1, 1938, by any nonmember bank which at the time of such application has been admitted to the benefits of insurance by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation under section 12B of this act, the Federal Reserve Board, in its discretion, in order to facilitate the admission of such bank to membership in the Federal Reserve System, may waive in whole or in part the requirements of this section relating to the admission of such bank to membership: Provided, That, if such bank is admitted with a capital less than that required for the organization of a national bank in the same place and its capital and surplus are not, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, adequate in relation to its liabilities to depositors and other creditors, the Federal Reserve Board may, in its discretion, require such bank to increase its capital and surplus to such amount as the Board may deem necessary within such period prescribed by the Board as in its judgment shall be reasonable in view of all the circumstances. Provided, however, That no such bank shall be required to increase its capital to an amount in excess of that required for the organization of a national bank in the same place.

Mr. SISSON. I thank the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will only take a minute or two on this particular point, and I will conclude. I want to call the attention of the House also to this, as a matter of fairness and as a matter of justice. We hear the argument made by gentlemen from different parts of the country about the small bank, the bank in the small village.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SISSON. I have full sympathy with that view, as I know every member of the committee has, but again, in the language of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], the paramount duty of Congress in that respect is to look first to the safety and the security of the depositors.

I have no criticism of any member of the committee for what may appear to be a reversal of policy. Although I am not authorized to speak for him, I believe the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], like myself, is disappointed that Federal deposit insurance is not going to be extended to deposits over $5,000. I believe it was the original purpose of the gentleman, as was first written in the law, that deposits should be insured 100 percent up to $10,000, 75 percent from $10,000 to $50,000, and 50 percent on all over $50,000. I believe the gentleman from Alabama had that in his mind, for with the present limit of $5,000 there is the danger that in certain communities deposits might be drained off; there might be too much splitting of deposits and deposits might be drained off in turn when there was fear in the particular community regarding the soundness of a particular bank. I know this is one of the things the gentleman wanted to guard against.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SISSON. I would be pleased to.

Mr. STEAGALL. I think we have covered very desirable ground in an admirable way by the provisions of this bill. We are making permanent the insurance of deposits up to the amount of $5,000 for each individual depositor and levying the assessment on all insured banks upon the basis of the total deposits. It is such a forward step, and I think it means so much to the country, that I am willing to accept this as the best thing to be done at this time. If we find by experience that it is desirable to enlarge the amount of the insurance, we shall be in position then to profit by our experience. I may say to the gentleman that it is my opinion that when the banks of the country wake up to the fact that they are not insured against one another, as they will before many years, the banks themselves will ask us for the insurance of deposits to the extent to which we originally planned.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 2 additional minutes.

Mr. SISSON. May I say to the very able chairman of our committee that I am very glad to hear him say that; and I respect his judgment as coming from one far better informed than I in that respect. I am sorry only that we have any difference of opinion about the method of bringing about the unification of the banking systems of the country. Again I am venturing to predict—I should not ask him to answer this question—I believe the gentleman from Alabama himself recognizes that the unification of the system must come if we are going to afford complete protection for the depositors and maintain our banking system intact. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the situation in the Chamber recalls to my mind an incident that occurred during the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act in 1909. It was a night session in the merry month of August in Washington, D. C., and the first speaker of the evening was our late beloved Speaker, the Honorable Henry T. Rainey. When he rose at his desk he looked slowly about the Chamber and then said: "Mr. Chairman, I never before realized what a vast quantity of furniture this Chamber contains." [Laughter.]

There has been a complete change in this Chamber since that long-gone night, Mr. Chairman. Nearly all the actors of that scene have passed into the shades of the hereafter, and the furniture is gone, showing that the vandal hand of time spares nothing in Washington, neither furniture, nor trees, nor buildings, nor anything else; but the Chamber itself under similar conditions retains the same appearance of impressive and oppressive vastness.

When the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] was making his able and thoughtful address, and while we are on opposite sides of the fence I want to say his discussions are always thoughtful, he paid a modest, and I think, deserved tribute to the bankers of the country. I bethought myself to say a word because I may sometimes overlook saying that word.

In my consideration of this legislation, and the banking system of this country, and what ought to be done about it, it is without any thought of prejudice whatever against the bankers as men, as individuals, as citizens, or as bankers. I have a good deal of respect for a banker. I believe we naturally respect and somewhat envy those qualities that we most lack, and I really admire and somewhat envy the sand and the cement of character and stability that it takes to build up and maintain throughout a long life a successful banking business.

Mr. Chairman, I lived a long time before I made what struck me as a very important discovery. It might seem to some of you not like a discovery at all. It came to me like a revelation. When it came it altered my entire outlook on my fellow man. That was the discovery that there is only one kind of human nature in the world. There is not one kind of human nature owning and operating banks and another kind depositing money in them and still another kind borrowing from them. There is not one kind of human nature owning utility holding companies, another kind owning operating companies, and still another kind consuming the product and paying the freight. There is not one kind of human nature owning mines and another kind working in them. There is only one kind of human nature in the world, and it is a kind that takes a whole lot of supervision to keep it in line in order to make it respect and preserve the rights of its fellow men and so use its own as not to injure the rights and property of others. It is not a difference in human nature. It is a matter of system.

Paradoxical as it may seem, in view of the rather severe nature of my ideas of what ought to be done about the banking system, I have no feeling against a man like Charles E. Mitchell; I have no feeling against a man like Samuel B. Insull. I feel that these men were first the beneficiaries, then the victims of the system. Strange as it may seem, I felt a sort of sympathy for them. I had a sort of sneaking gladness when they beat the law to the rap, as the saying is. I felt they were fully as good as the bankers and the utility magnates who still carried on, and as good as the rest of us. The breaks of the game simply went against them.

What we want in banking is a different system and in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that is what this bill will bring about. I have one more thought, because my time is running, and I have not said what I intended to say, because I have a prepared speech here in my pocket.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. If what the gentleman has in his speech in his pocket is any better than what he has already told us, he must have a fine speech in his pocket.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I thank the gentleman from Maryland, who always makes a fine speech himself.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. The gentleman has made a fine philosophical argument, and he is an able philosopher, and one of the most valued Members of this House. If he will permit an intrusion upon his argument, I should like to observe, with reference to the statement often made in this debate of the superiority in safety of member banks over nonmember banks—and I would have no one construe in what I say I am not for the highest degree of safety and security in banking—there are two periods in the life of most men, the period of youth when chances are taken, and the period of age, when safety is the prime consideration. So it is with the Nation. We have had our period of great development, when chances were taken, and now it seems we have come to the period when safety is the main consideration, and, while I hope we have not come to the period of old age nationally yet, we have come to a period of sobriety. In that period of our national life when we were in great development, it was the small, independent banker who took no small part in the great drama of building America, and, of course, chances were taken. Many of us can remember back—and this does not prevail very much today—when a banker would loan money without collateral to a young man of character and ability to establish himself in business. Many large businesses in the United States, and much local business had beginnings with the small country banker, which, in the aggregate, have greatly contributed to make America great and prosperous. My point is that the criticism often stated here or at least implied, for safety of Reserve member banks against nonmember banks, should at least be tempered with the part these smaller nonmember banks, and mostly country banks, have played in the period of our great development. In our period of sobriety let us not be too harsh with them.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I thank the able gentleman from Ohio for his own philosophical contribution regarding the small independent bankers and will say in reply that it is my intention to support the bill as it is, preserving their independence, while granting them the privilege of deposit insurance.

Mr. Chairman, I feel indebted to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] for having furnished some convincing detail in support of a matter to which I have made some reference in the embalmed remarks which I have in my pocket; that is, to the transactions of the Reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board during certain stages of the speculative orgy in Wall Street that precipitated the crash in this country in 1929, in which it appears that a number of Reserve bankers came to Washington and tried to prevail on the Federal Reserve Board to not scale down the discount rates and to raise the discount rates. He mentioned the bank in Chicago that had to reduce its rediscount rate from 4 to 3½ percent. He mentioned a number of incidents to show that the Federal Reserve Board here in Washington was deaf even to the pleas of Federal Reserve banks to do something to check this orgy by raising the discount rates.

I did not interrupt the gentleman in his remarks, but I wanted to ask him why the Federal Reserve Board refused to do anything here in Washington, which they could have done, and the means of which they had solely in their hands, to check that thing before it got beyond all control. I did not ask the gentleman the question. Perhaps it would not have been an entirely honest question, because I had the answer in my own mind, which it would take time and facts to dislodge. It is that the Federal Reserve Board in Washington was under influence far greater than the power and influence of the Federal Reserve banks themselves. The name "Federal Reserve bank" is imposing, but they are not such big fish in the puddle. What is a dozen Federal Reserve banks compared with the Houses of Morgan, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and others, who were making tens and hundreds of millions of dollars out of the innocent investors of this country by bringing in and unloading on them the fraudulent bonds of the world, the worthless billions of "blue sky" stock of the holding companies, and every other great speculative group in this country? There was a power in the United States greater than the Reserve banks, and that was the power and the influence that kept the Federal Reserve banks from doing anything to check and remedy that situation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, we want to do something by this legislation to prevent repetition of that sort of thing. This Republic of ours cannot endure with a power within greater than Government itself. A power that can come down to Washington and control the Government as the Government was controlled at that time, a Government which not only did nothing to stop and check that orgy but actually underwrote and propagandized it and told the people of this country there was no end to that sort of thing.

Mr. Chairman, I came to the consideration of this bill a week ago with a preconceived idea that I was in favor of legislation that would place the Reserve Bank System under the control of the Government but I had a hearsay prejudice against this bill, and thought it did not reach that objective; but as a result of listening to the able and informative debate, and I may say the most able and informative debate I have heard on a bill since I came back to Congress, I have arrived at the conclusion that the power is in the bill to regulate these matters.

It is agreed that the crux of the bill is title II, enlarging the powers and tightening Government control over the Federal Reserve System. As these enlarged powers deal with monetary and credit policies rather than the mechanics of banking, a layman may at least be qualified to arrive at fairly sound conclusions drawn from the arguments.

I want to compliment the drafting, the legislative workmanship, on this title. I had anticipated that, considering its subject matter, it would be long and involved, perhaps to be understood only by a banking lawyer. On the contrary, it occupies only 15 pages in the bill; and if a Member will sit down to it with a lead pencil and do a little underscoring, its salient features in clear and concise language will stand out from the page.

The provisions in the title fall clearly into two categories. One, the enlarged banking powers granted the Federal Reserve Board and banking system, and the other enlarged controlling powers granted the Government over the Reserve Board and banking system. The controversy is waged around these two questions.

On either side of these two questions the opposing schools of thought arrange themselves naturally. The controversy is even simpler than this. It has been made clear in the large number of speeches on both sides that the quarrel is not so much what the powers are as it is where the powers are lodged. We may virtually dismiss from consideration any serious question over the enlarged powers granted the Federal Reserve Board and banking system by title II of the bill: The open-market policy under which the Reserve banks will buy and sell bonds and other securities, thus expanding or contracting the currency as they buy or sell; the discount rates whereby the banks make money cheap or dear and stimulate or retard speculation accordingly; the bank reserves, which, by lowering, increase the amount of money which must be kept in circulation and, by raising, reduce its volume.

These three banking powers in this bill, placed fully in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, an agency of the Government controlled by the President of the United States, can make the tides of finance and of credit to ebb and flow. The exercise of these great powers will affect the economic welfare of every living being in the United States. And, fourth, the provision that the Federal Reserve Board may authorize—I quote:

> Any Federal Reserve bank to discount any commercial, agricultural, or industrial paper of a member bank and may make advances to any such bank on its promissory notes secured by any sound assets of such member bank.

The banks may select an open-market advisory committee, who may make recommendations to the Federal Reserve Board with regard to the open-market policy, but the Federal Reserve Board has the sole authority to fix the policy, and then—I quote:

> Each Federal Reserve bank shall purchase or sell obligations of the United States, bankers' acceptances, bills of exchange, and other obligations in order to effectuate the open-market policies adopted by the Board—

Shall purchase or sell.

But the main quarrel is, Where shall this vast power be lodged? In the banks, says one school of thought; in the Government, says the other school of thought. And advocates of the private control go so far as to say in so many words that a bad private control would be better than what they call "a political control."

Let me see if I can briefly enumerate the control of Government over the System. All of the powers of the Governor, chairman of the board of directors, and Federal Reserve agent of each of the Reserve banks will be vested in one person, the Governor. The Governor will be nominated by the board of directors of the bank, but his nomination will be subject to confirmation by the Federal Reserve Board. This is the new check of the Federal Reserve Board on the Federal Reserve bank executive power.

The Governor of the Federal Reserve Board is appointed by the President and, I quote, "to serve as such until the further order of the President."

This, then, is where the Government control comes in—the power of the Reserve Board over the executives of the Reserve banks and the power of the President over the Reserve Board, and when this control is coupled with the enlarged Reserve Board powers over the monetary and credit operations of the System, we have the completed picture of Government control over the Reserve banking system of the United States.

The immensity of this power is not yet fully disclosed. The immensity of this power lies in the fact that in this country today the exercise of the function of issuing money and regulating the value thereof is vested very largely in the Federal Reserve System. I demonstrate this. The Secretary of the Treasury is the financial head of the Government. He exercises certain monetary functions in little more than a ministerial way. He buys gold and silver and locks them up in the Treasury. He may issue some silver dollars and silver certificates. The volume of national-bank circulation is fixed. The volume of greenbacks is fixed. With the exception of the money issued by the Federal Reserve System the volume of money in the United States is fixed.

The chief function of the Secretary of the Treasury is that of raising revenue, issuing, dealing in, refunding, and retiring the national debt.

The Federal Reserve System issues money and withdraws money, and by the volume of its issue and withdrawal it regulates the value of money, and thus the value of things. It can expand the currency by buying a billion dollars' worth of bonds and throwing out a billion dollars' worth of new notes in exchange for them. It can contract the volume of currency by selling a billion dollars' worth of bonds and taking in that amount of its notes in exchange for them.

The Federal Reserve System, therefore, is the monetary authority of the United States. It exercises the monetary functions vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States.

In determining where this great power should be lodged, let us take another brief glance at the manner of the exercise of the power by the privately controlled System since it has been in existence.

I have already mentioned its refusal to raise the discount rates before the panic. It has been charged repeatedly, I accept it as an established fact, that the Federal Reserve System, by calling in and enforcing liquidation of its loans in 1920, brought about the deflation which knocked down the commodity-price level, impoverished agriculture, and reduced the whole economic structure of the country. It therefore brought on one panic and refused to stop another.

The men who did these things, being private citizens, are still at the head of their institutions and their institutions are still going concerns and still in the exercise of the great powers which they so badly used. But the political regime in control of the Government, and charged in the public mind with responsibility for the historic disaster thus brought about, has rightly or wrongly been swept into political oblivion.

This gives us the penalty for the misuse of the powers conferred upon Government by this bill. This is the answer to the criticism of the vesting of this power in Government. "Uneasy lies the head that wears the crown", is just as true of Presidents as of princes.

Mr. Chairman, the able Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], has been highly complimented on the floor of the House, I believe, by every member of his committee on both sides of the aisle for the courtesy and the fairness and the ability with which he conducted the hearings. Mr. Chairman, I want to add a compliment to the personnel of the Banking and Currency Committee of this House. I do not believe there is a committee in this House that has among its membership a greater number of men who are able to thoroughly discuss and defend or criticize a bill of their committee than the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. I cannot but feel that these men have brought out a fair bill that will reach the objective intended, and I will only say this, further, in conclusion.

In friendly hands this bill will bring about a new and better era in banking in the United States; but, on the contrary, in complaisant hands it can become and will become an engine of exploitation and oppression. No system will work in the hands of its enemies except for its enemies. Eternal vigilance is still the price of liberty. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who do not believe that this country or the nations of the rest of the world are ready or prepared for a managed-currency system. This bill, as I see it, seeks to establish a managed-currency system in this country, and does more. In its operation it will increase the interest load of the people of the United States and stabilize the interest load.

The thing that occurs to me in studying the money question and the plan proposed by this bill for the issuance and creation of legal-tender money is that there can be no money issued or created under this bill that does not carry the interest feature. Somebody must borrow the money from the banks of the country. Let me tell you, one of the difficulties we have in handling the money question is the failure of the business men of the country to distinguish and differentiate between cash and credit or differentiate between an automatically controlled or a managed-currency system and the automatic system of issuing and creating money by the coinage of the precious metals, gold and silver. When we adhere to the principle that was given us when our money system was established, we automatically increase the volume of money by the production of gold and silver, particularly gold, which circulates in coin or in silver or gold certificates as legal-tender money issued by the Government. In the operation of that system we had automatic control. It was after the bankers of the country, through their influence on legislation, had gradually eliminated this system that we substituted bank control of the issuance of money which must be borrowed at interest to get into circulation and subject to retirement when the eligible paper on which it was issued is liquidated. First, we demonetized silver in 1873, and now, under the gold bill, there is no longer any circulation of gold or gold certificates minus interest. Gold has been withdrawn from circulation and is used as coverage for the issuance of money which will be lent into circulation rather than issued into circulation.

I also wish to call your attention to the powers that are conferred upon the group in control of the banking business of this country under paragraph (o) of section 204:

(o) It shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise such powers as it possesses in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to business stability and to mitigate by its influence unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of the monetary action and credit administration.

This power can be used, as it was used in 1920, to retire money, destroy prices and credit, and bring ruination upon the business of the country.

I want further to direct your attention to section 16, page 64:

SEC. 16. Each Federal Reserve bank may issue Federal Reserve notes, which shall be obligations of the United States, secured by a first and paramount lien on all of the assets of such bank. Federal Reserve notes shall be issued and retired by Federal Reserve banks under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe and shall be legal tender for all purposes.

This is the power to retire money that was used in 1920, when a period of deflation was decided upon by the Federal Reserve Board, when the farming sections of this country were depressed, when prices were destroyed, when the lending value of property was reduced, and this brought disaster upon the agricultural districts of the Nation.

Another section I would like to call to your attention is section 209, on page 57:

Notwithstanding the other provisions of this section, the Federal Reserve Board, in order to prevent injurious credit expansion or contraction, may by regulation change the requirements as to reserves to be maintained against demand or time deposits or both by member banks in reserve and central reserve cities or by member banks not in reserve or central reserve cities or by all member banks.

Mr. Chairman, if there is anything that is going to reduce the security of the deposits in this country in the banks, it is this section that confers authority upon the Federal Reserve Board to reduce the security or the coverage for these deposits.

If we can eliminate from this bill the provision which is a concession to the banking interests to create and issue money to be lent into circulation and take the security feature of the bill, it would be a splendid piece of legislation. But I am opposed to any provision which confers on the banks the right to issue and circulate money which is an obligation against the people of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, there will be only one more speech during this debate. I want to say that we have given, not only to the members of the Banking and Currency Committee, an opportunity to discuss this bill, but we have extended an invitation to every Member of the House to participate in the discussion. Every Member of the House who has expressed a desire to do so has had an opportunity to speak.

I think it is proper to say that the remarks on the bill have justified the procedure, and we feel that the speeches warrant the assertion that the time consumed has been to the advantage of the House and to the country.

I desire to thank the Members of the House and the members of the committee for their courtesies and consideration and for their generous references to me, for which I am deeply grateful to all of you. I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, before I make a statement as to the bill, I hope the House will allow me to make a statement about the crime committee report being published.

The District of Columbia Committee, of which I am a member, had a crime subcommittee that made a report a few days ago to the whole committee. It was understood at the time the report was submitted that it was not official; that it would not be considered official until it was approved by the whole committee, if it was ever approved. It was distinctly understood that it would not be given out to the newspapers, and that the newspapers would be asked not to publish it if they had in any way obtained a copy of the report.

I was very much disappointed to see what was alleged to be a report printed in the next morning's paper. I feel like the integrity of the House is involved.

The newspapers were asked not to print the report, as it would not be official if they obtained a copy, since it was not official and would not be official until it was passed on by the whole committee. The whole committee has not passed on it. The whole committee has not examined the report. It has not read the report, and they know nothing about it except what was in the newspapers. I do not say that the report should be adopted or disapproved. I am not now passing on it. We have not been in a position to give it consideration. It should not have been published.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. While I got a copy, I know that some Members of Congress have tried to get a copy of the report from the District Committee but have been refused a copy. They were told same were all under lock and key. Will the gentleman explain why a confidential report not yet approved by the committee can be given to the newspapers and published, while Members of Congress cannot get it?

Mr. PATMAN. I cannot understand that.

Mr. KVALE. If the gentleman will yield, I saw one statement in which it said that the report was to be held confidential until presented to the full committee; that when it was presented to the full committee it was understood by the newspaper representatives that the report was public information.

Mr. PATMAN. I know that the newspapermen were instructed by the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], the chairman of the committee, not to print any report if they obtained it from any source. They were warned not to print that report. Why they printed it I do not know and, we, the committee, certainly would not agree to a report in a 2-hour session which attacked the reputation of honorable men. We refused to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I had a copy of the report because I know how to get it, and I happen to know that before the committee met on Wednesday morning every bit of that confidential report, which had not yet been passed upon or approved by the gentleman's committee, had been set up in type by the two Hearst newspapers and another in the city of Washington, all ready to be printed in full, waiting for the gentleman's committee to approve it, and when the gentleman's committee did not approve it, they printed it anyway, in spite of the committee's action and its order that it should not be printed. They ignored the committee and, in effect, said: "To hell with Congress and the committee; we will do just what we please with a subcommittee report."

Mr. PATMAN. I do not say that that was the report that the subcommittee made.

Mr. BLANTON. It was a one-man report, gotten up by a disgruntled former employee of Judge Garnett (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who throughout its entire length, from beginning to end, could not disguise his spleen and malice against Judge Garnett and others. He was out to "get" Garnett and tried to do it. I compared the newspaper print closely with the printed report Fitzpatrick prepared that I have, and I know these newspapers had a copy of it. I congratulate my friend and his District Committee on refusing to approve it.

Mr. PATMAN. Anyway, it is not official, and the printing of the report was not authorized, and I do not think anyone had a right to pass judgment on it until the whole committee passed on it.

Mr. BLANTON. I furnished the United States district attorney, Judge Garnett, with a copy of it because it viciously and maliciously attacked him and he had a right to see it to defend himself, as he is an appointee of the President of the United States, and such an unwarranted attack was a reflection on the President, and our Department of Justice.

When Fitzpatrick maliciously attacked Judge Garnett as a law officer of Washington, and he did it unjustly, and he printed his malicious report prematurely, and he did it without authority, he has done more to break down respect for law and the morale of law enforcement than you can undo in 10 years, and that is just what he has done by publishing his attack. More has been done to break down law enforcement hereby preparing and printing that unauthorized report than anything that could have been done. Fitzpatrick has demoralized law enforcement in Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman does not mean that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] had anything to do with it?

Mr. BLANTON. No; certainly not. It was Mr. PATMAN, Mr. WERNER, and other wise members on the District Committee, with sound, splendid, good judgment, who refused to approve Fitzpatrick's malicious report, and, with Chairman NORTON, ordered that it should not be printed until the committee could examine the hearings and have time to digest and pass on it. And I commend the District Committee for taking such action.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. PATMAN. I am through, anyway, Mr. Chairman. I know that what I have said is out of order, and I am through.

Mr. Chairman, in regard to this bill, it is a good long definite step in the right direction. I would like to see it embrace other provisions that I am very enthusiastic about, but whether it does or not, I am for this bill. It is a good bill as far as it goes. I commend the committee for the hard work that the members of the committee have done in committee meetings, listening to testimony of dozens of witnesses. I know that they have conscientiously done their very best. Although I differ with some of them on certain sections, I give them credit for having the very best of intentions.

Title II is the contested section of the bill. I would first like to take up the unification of the banking system. We have today 48 States and the Federal Government, 49 governments, in effect, controlling our money and credit. There was a time in my legislative experience when I was not satisfied on the proposition of taking over the State banks. I thought it was invading the State's business, but I am convinced now the business of coining money and regulating its value should be administered by the Federal Government and the Federal Government alone.

You cannot control money and credit in this country if you have 49 separate and distinct governments controlling money and credit. It is true that the State governments cannot coin money, they cannot issue money, but they can issue demand deposits which have exactly the same force and effect as actual money. So when you determine the amount of circulating medium, you determine not only the amount of money, which is small, but you determine the amount of demand deposits subject to check, and you add the two together and you have our circulating medium. We have these 48 States. Any State can set up its own State banking institutions and any State legislature can give the State banks the right to issue $5 to every $1 the bank has, or $10 to every $1 the bank has or $15 or $20 to every dollar the bank has. So, how are you going to control the money situation if you cannot control the money-creating institutions? We have only 5,000 national banks, and we have about 10,000 State banks. As long as we can control only the 5,000 and cannot control the 10,000 money-creating institutions, how are you going to regulate the value of money?

You cannot possibly do it, and you might just as well give it up. It is not the function of a State to either coin money or regulate the value of money. No one will deny that. Therefore, if it is not the function of a State, why do you want a State to exercise that function in competition with the Federal Government? Does not the Constitution of the United States provide that Congress shall have the right to coin money and regulate its value? How are you going to carry out that mandatory duty if you are turning loose money-creating institutions in this country over which you have absolutely no control?

If there is a State bank in the home town of my distinguished friend, the chairman of this committee [Mr. STEAGALL], and he goes in there to borrow $1,000 by giving his note, he gives the note through the window and the cashier puts back through the same window a deposit slip for $1,000; and that State bank, under no restriction or limitation from the Federal Government, has created $1,000 in new money. They can do that just as much as the legislature of that State permits them to do it. So how is the Federal Government going to control and regulate the value of money if you are going to have only 5,000 national banks under your control and have 10,000 money-creating institutions under the control of State governments with no control over them? You cannot do it. You might just as well give it up. If you really and honestly want Congress to regulate the value of money, the first thing you have to do is to put power into the hands of Congress that will permit Congress to regulate the value of money. The first step in that direction is unifying the banking system, causing all banks to come under the Federal Reserve banking system.

We passed a law for Federal bank-deposit insurance. Somebody had to put up the premium to guarantee the deposits in all the banks. Somebody had to put up the initial premium. Three hundred and thirty-nine million dollars was the sum deposited. You might call it the initial premium. The Federal Government put up $300,000,000 of that money, and all the banks in the Nation, including the State banks that were permitted to come under the system, put up the other $39,000,000. Is it right for the Federal Government to use the taxpayers' money out of the Federal Treasury to insure State banks over which the Federal Government has no control whatsoever?

The Federal Government put up $300,000,000 of the $339,000,000. That was done with the understanding that by January 1, 1937, all these State banks would come under the Federal Reserve System and be members of the Federal Reserve Banking System. I took the view of many that we should not make harsh requirements of them; that we should be easy with them. There was an amendment passed which permits those banks to come in, regardless of the amount of their capital stock. I do not care if the amount is $25,000 or what it is, less than you could use as a basis for the organization of a national bank, but regardless of their capital stock, they can come into the Federal Reserve System. So we wrote into the law that they must come in by January 1, 1937, and we thought that that law would continue, but for some reason, I do not know why, this committee in passing on this legislation, although this subject is not directly related, picked up that provision of the law and repealed it, and said, "These State banks can indefinitely get the benefit of the insurance that the Federal Government is paying for, not be under the supervision of the Federal Government, continue to get their benefits and never come under the Federal Reserve banking system"; in other words, "Go ahead as money-creating institutions, create money in competition with the national banks, create money that this Congress cannot control." It puts them beyond our reach, as a Congress, to regulate the value of money. Are you going to let them do that? If you pass this bill as it is written, you will. You will have 10,000 of these money-creating institutions over which you will have no control. But the Federal Government will have the right to change the reserve requirements of the national banks, which they should have the right to do, but they will not have that power over State banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Therefore, this section relating to January 1, 1937, which requires State banks to come into the Federal Reserve System by that time should not be repealed. I expect to support the amendment that will be offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK], when it is offered, to restore the law to read as it does now and strike that provision from this bill.

Next, an amendment will be offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] that will cause the Government to pay the member banks $146,000,000 in capital stock, and the Government will own the stock of the 12 Federal Reserve banks. I expect to support that amendment.

When this country was new we had to have gold in order to trade with foreign countries, when we were an importing nation and not an exporting nation. We needed gold to carry on the business with foreign countries. At that time our Government, struggling as it was, borrowed money from foreign banks. It was right that our Government should pay interest to those banks. If we borrowed money from a foreign country, it was right that we should pay interest on that money borrowed from the foreign government; or, if our industrious citizens should go out into the hills of the West and with their own hands pan out gold, and our Nation should need that gold to carry on its business with other nations, and our country should borrow that gold from its citizens, it was right that our country should pay interest on that gold.

We do not have that situation today, however; we neither borrow from a foreign bank nor a foreign government, nor do we borrow gold from our own citizens. The Government today is borrowing its own credit and is paying tribute to a few big bankers for the privilege of using that credit. I would like to see it stopped. The Federal Reserve banks, for instance—12 of them—hold $2,500,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 of Government securities—Government bonds. How did they purchase those bonds? They were purchased with Government credit and the Government continues to pay interest on those bonds of the Federal Government.

The salaries of the Federal Reserve officials have been paid by money that would have otherwise gone into the Treasury of the United States—$30,000, $40,000, and $50,000 a year. All the money they could spend, under the old law, they did not have to turn over to the Treasury of the United States; but the law has been changed and all surplus goes into the surplus fund of the Federal Reserve bank. Remember that not one dollar of Federal Reserve bank stock is owned by a citizen, not one dollar of it is owned by the United States Government; every dollar of it is owned by private corporations; and these banks pay no taxes upon any transaction—do not forget that—they are tax exempt, tax free. They do their business without taxation. The only tax they pay is the insignificant tax on their real estate, no more. Not a tax of any kind is laid upon the hundreds of billions of dollars' worth of transactions they do annually in this country with the use of Government credit.

Do you know what they can do? The Federal Reserve agent representing the Government of the United States, as such, has at his service the Bureau of Engraving and Printing here in Washington, a bureau which employs 5,500 people who sometimes work night and day to print money.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. We will say the chairman of the Board, the Federal Reserve agent in New York City, wants some money. He communicates with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. He has $10,000,000 in Government bonds that the Federal Reserve bank holds. He deposits the bonds there with himself, has $10,000,000 in money printed, and the money is distributed, of course, to the member banks, and they get interest for the use of that money. They get the use of the credit of this Nation absolutely free. Every Federal Reserve note, which is currency, paper money, greenbacks—I do not care what you call it—is guaranteed by the Government. The Government of the United States guarantees that note; it is a blanket mortgage on all the property of all the people of this Nation, and the taxing power of this Government can be used to redeem that note.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. As a matter of fact, that is all the value the note has, is it not?

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly. It would not be as good without the credit of the Nation. It is true it has the backing of the assets of the Federal Reserve bank, but what really makes it good is the credit of this Nation.

This money costs the Federal Reserve bank about 27 cents per $1,000—the actual cost of printing. That is all the Federal Reserve bank pays—no taxes; it pays absolutely nothing but the cost of the printing of the money.

Do you believe that our Government should permit the further farming out of the great privilege to a few big banks of this country to issue blanket mortgages on the property of the people and use the taxing power to redeem the money, if necessary, without the Government getting 1 cent on earth for the use of this great privilege? The first question is, Should they do it at all? And the second question is, If they are permited to do it, should not the Government get paid for the use of its own credit?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The Government also bears the expense of protecting those notes from counterfeiters, does it not?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, of course; the Government takes all the responsibility of protecting the Federal Reserve System. So it is not an individual that is issuing this money, it is a corporation that is owned by corporations. Every dollar of the stock in every Federal Reserve bank is owned by these private corporations. So you have farmed out to the corporations owned by other corporations the great privilege of issuing the money of this great country of ours. It really should be stopped.

You have heard a great deal about getting the Government out of private business. Yes; I am in favor of getting the Government out of private business, but at the same time I am in favor of getting the bankers out of the Government business. The issuance and distribution of money is a Government function and should not be farmed out to the private bankers. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read down to and including line 3 on page 1.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 7617, the Banking Act of 1935, had come to no resolution thereon.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am sure I voice the sentiment of every Member of this House when I say that I appreciate the very constructive and informative address just delivered before the Committee of the Whole by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]. When the gentleman from Texas speaks, he knows what he is talking about. I have watched him since he came to this House, and I notice that he goes to the bottom of things. There is not a harder worker in this body, nor does any other Member enjoy a greater respect of the entire Membership of this House than does the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I desire now to mention the name of another distinguished statesman. I refer to Hon. Robert L. Owen, for many years a very distinguished and able Member of the United States Senate from the State of Oklahoma, former Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and author of the Federal Reserve Act. Senator Owen is undoubtedly one of the greatest authorities in America on the money and banking questions. [Applause.]

Since the present banking bill has been pending in the House of Representatives, several Members of the delegation in Congress from Oklahoma have been giving this bill much study and serious consideration. This week our delegation called upon our good friend, the distinguished former Senator from Oklahoma, who was good enough to confer with us and give our delegation the benefit of his views concerning the measure and especially in connection with the controversial features of the pending bill.

After a conference with Senator Owen, our delegation was so impressed with his vast wealth of information that we asked him to prepare a statement giving his views in some detail on the pending banking bill. This he had done, and I feel that his statement would be of vital interest to the American people.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD at this point the statement in question as prepared by Senator Robert L. Owen on the pending banking bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman if this is the same statement Senator Owen put in the RECORD of the proceedings before the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. No; it is not the same statement. But, as I suggested a few moments ago, it is a very informative statement prepared by Senator Owen especially for the Oklahoma delegation in Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The following is Senator Owen's statement prepared for the Oklahoma delegation in Congress:

Answering the request of members of the Oklahoma delegation as to my views on the banking bill of 1935, I very respectfully would say:

The bill, in my opinion, is of supreme importance in granting in clear terms to the Federal Reserve Board:

1. The power to buy and sell bonds and bankable assets, and thereby expand and contract demand bank deposits which function as money.

2. The right to increase or decrease member-bank reserves.

3. The right to control the interest and discount rate.

4. The right to approve the governor of the Federal Reserve bank, and practically, through the class C directors, to control the personnel and management of the bank, so far as monetary policy is concerned.

5. A very important addition to the flexibility and power of the Reserve banks is granting by expanding the eligibility of member-bank paper for discount, and giving them larger powers to make real-estate loans.

The mandate inserted by the committee in the original bill, which directs the Reserve Board to use its powers to promote business stability, is excellent so far as it goes, because it is well known that this administration, and particularly the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Eccles, favor the policies of Mr. Roosevelt, of restoring property values and giving the country a dollar whose debt-paying power would be as great as when the debt was contracted. The President has informed the country in his last Sunday radio address that this bill was a minimum of what is required to restore the country to normal.

I think the mandate referred to would be improved by inserting before the words "business stability" the words "maximum employment and * * *." The country should be advised by the language of the bill that it was the intention to use the powers granted by this bill to restore employment to a maximum by restoring the money supply of the country and the working capital which have been destroyed in the last 4 years.

Senator FLETCHER in his last Sunday's radio broadcast (see extension of remarks, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Apr. 30) pointed out that this contraction is twenty-one billions. This money engaged in production, transportation, distribution, and personal services, having been withdrawn, has necessarily thrown out of employment thirteen or fourteen millions of people. This productive capital can be immediately restored by the purchase of Government bonds, State bonds, or other sound bankable assets by the Federal Reserve banks under the direction of the Federal Reserve Board.

There are several minor points which I should like to see corrected.

For example, there is no use whatever in requiring (page 54, line 22) 35 percent of lawful money (not including Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes) against the member-bank deposits for the simple reason that these deposits of necessity, being fixed by law, are very rarely drawn upon at all, and if they were drawn upon to any extent, could be immediately paid in legal-tender money. There is no sound reason for holding 35 percent of the vast future reserves that will go into these banks, especially that such 35 percent shall be in terms of pocket money, when the pocket money required can be instantly supplied out of the existing supplies of such money available to such banks.

There is a sound reason why it should not be required in the form in which it appears in the bill, because as the words of the bill are written, excluding Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes (which are now legal tender) and discrediting such notes as lawful money would leave only greenbacks remaining, which are scattered in the pockets of 125,000,000 people. It would be absurd to count the gold certificates held by the Reserve banks as reserve against such deposits, because such gold certificates are available as security for the issuance of legal tender money of all kinds, but are not available to be paid to the member banks in settlement of reserves. The silver certificates are not available because in $1 bills, unavoidably needed for pocket change.

I favor the bill with or without amendment, for the reason that the increased powers are necessary for the protection of the American people, are necessary for regulating the supply of money, are necessary for regulating the value of money, a duty imposed on Congress by the Constitution.

The Goldsborough amendment is gravely objectionable for the simple reason that the all-commodity index for the average of the years 1921–29, being based on gold at $20.67 an ounce, would be greatly different and greatly lower than an index based on gold at $35 on ounce.

The fact that agricultural products sold for gold in Liverpool bring a larger number of dollars now than they did before we changed the content of our gold dollar, did add to the number of dollars obtained for such products, but did not add to the real value, except for debt-paying purposes to the extent of such actual shipments, leaving the United States, with that exception, no better off than it was before. What the farmers need in this country is to receive a larger number of dollars in our domestic markets, where the paper dollar, the check-money dollar, has a greater value than the gold dollar. The evidence that our domestic dollar has more value than the gold dollar is the vital fact that in the last 12 months the outside world has sent us 14 hundred millions of gold dollars by weight of gold to purchase domestic dollars with which to buy our commodities.

You ask my views on the so-called "Goldsborough amendment" proposing to restore the dollar to the average value of 1921–29; that is, to the 1926 all-commodity index. The Godsborough amendment also provides for a complete change in the all-commodity index from 784 commodities down to the basic commodities shipped abroad, amounting to probably 50 items. The Goldsborough amendment also provides a complete change in the meaning and significance of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, with its intricate provisions.

First. It is my judgment that since the all-commodity index of 1921–29 was based on $20.67 per ounce of gold, or 25.8 grains troy per dollar, that mathematical number for such index would be entirely changed when gold has been increased 60 percent in terms of dollars by placing an ounce of gold at $35 instead of $20.67 per ounce.

Moreover, the index of that period has been seriously advanced by the scarcity produced through governmental policies of cutting down the production of basic farm commodities and the commodities under the codes. Moreover, the great drouth in the Western States has artificially raised the all-commodity index, and these vital changes in the index have taken place without any expansion whatever of the money supply of the United States, but our money supply has been actually contracted, since March 1933, to the extent of several billion dollars.

The very recent expansion of demand deposits by the purchase of Government bonds by the banks has served no adequate purpose to increase the credit to business men, because the increase of such deposits has been employed by the member banks to liquidate loans to business men, thus transferring from business men these credits to the Government.

For these reasons the index of 1921–29 is much too low to restore the value of property which existed at that time.

I regard it as a very serious matter to attempt to change in this casual fashion the all-commodity index, which has been built up at the expense of many millions of dollars through a period of over a generation.

I think it is as equally serious a matter to attempt to change the national policy established by the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, whose intricate provisions should be examined by your delegation before consenting to a change. This is a technical matter and requires the closest scrutiny in order to avoid making worse our present difficult position. The amendment referred to proposes a so-called "free gold" market, which means taking away from the gold any fixed relationship to the American dollar, thus running the risk of losing such advantages as are already claimed by those who advocated raising the price of gold. But, what is far worse, it is authorizing by law the speculation in gold, the basic international money of the world. It seems to me to be an unsound policy to permit, much less to encourage, the speculation in gold. For it renders unstable the international measure of value and permits gold and the price of gold to be manipulated by speculation. In my opinion, the grief of the world has been brought about by permitting speculation in our money supply by private forces seeking profit. This was the very thing so strongly condemned in the Democratic national platform, which attributed this last depression "to the indefensible expansion and contraction of credit (that is, money) for private profit at the expense of the public."

I am opposed to speculation in gold and, being opposed to the speculation in our money supply which has resulted in the present disaster to America and the world, I have done what I could to establish a sound opinion in favor of stabilizing the value of money and preventing private speculation in money destroying all values created by human labor.

Those of the delegation who care to see my views on this bill will find them set forth at length in the hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, page 553, March 26, 1935.

Yours respectfully,

ROBERT L. OWEN.

CRIME CONDITIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. WERNER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of subcommittee of the District of Columbia Committee, which, under resolution passed by the House, investigated crime conditions in the District of Columbia, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until next Friday to file minority views.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

A DASTARDLY, DIABOLICAL NEWSPAPER PLOT TO WANTONLY AND MALICIOUSLY ASSASSINATE THE CHARACTER AND TRY TO RUIN A UNITED STATES ATTORNEY AND OTHER HIGH PUBLIC OFFICIALS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, as a preface to a unanimous-consent request I intend to make, I call attention to another false statement published in this afternoon's Washington Times, as follows:

Representative THOMAS BLANTON, of Texas, called on the Attorney General yesterday but would not divulge the reason for his visit. He wrote letters yesterday to several members of the House District Committee urging them to tone down their criticism of Inspector Headley in the report.

Mr. Speaker, I went to the Attorney General's office in the United States Department of Justice on important business yesterday afternoon at 4:45 o'clock. No one connected with newspapers knew of my going unless they watched me when I left my office and followed me. No one saw me go in his office, for it almost takes an Indian guide to find out how to get to his office through the many winding corridors of that tremendous building.

When I came out into the hall from the Attorney General's office about 5:15 p. m. I found five Washington newspaper reporters there in the hall waiting for me and insisting, all five of them in concert, that I tell them what I was doing there. This is just illustrative of the remarks that I made yesterday about newspapers snooping into our official business matters here.

This Washington Times on this Saturday afternoon, May 4, 1935, says that I wrote letters yesterday, which would be on Friday, May 3, 1935, to several members of the House District Committee urging them to tone down their criticism of Inspector Headley. Yesterday I did not write any letters whatsoever to any member of the District Committee on May 3, 1935. I did not write any letter to a single member of that committee the day before yesterday, which was Thursday, May 2, 1935. I have not written a letter to any member of the District of Columbia Committee since that committee held its executive session on last Wednesday, May 1, 1935. Such a false statement as the one appearing in this afternoon's Washington Times illustrates what I stated yesterday about Hearst's papers here printing false assertions about me.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on this alleged report of the crime committee, and especially to discuss a proposal that has been made but which has not yet reached the committee, but we learn of it through the newspapers, in reference to consolidating the Park Police with the Metropolitan Police.

The Park Police are under the control of the United States Government exclusively and, while preserving order in the parks here, protect United States property in the District of Columbia.

In this connection I desire to include some statements from officials and citizens about this report, and other data, to which I wish to refer in my remarks. I also want to discuss generally the subject of this crime investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my colleagues for granting me the privilege of discussing a report drawn for the Crime Subcommittee, which the press says was jointly prepared by Mr. John R. Fitzpatrick and Mr. William F. Seals; and for allowing me to include statements from officials and citizens and other data I wish to refer to in my remarks.

TO INVESTIGATE CRIME IN WASHINGTON AND RECOMMEND LEGISLATION

I helped to pass the House resolution authorizing this investigation. But I never dreamed that part of the $1,500 the House authorized to be spent "to investigate crime" would be frittered away and wasted in employing the said John R. Fitzpatrick, a spiteful, disgruntled former assistant of United States Attorney Leslie C. Garnett, with malice in his heart against his chief and an all-consuming intent to injure and try to ruin him, and paying Fitzpatrick $225 per month when he was wholly unfit, and has not been worth 5 cents to the Government. And I never dreamed that another part of this $1,500 would be frittered away and wasted in employing the said William F. Seals, at $225 per month, who when the Crime Subcommittee first met appeared before it as a reporter for the Washington Post, which has malice toward and seeks to harass a number of public officials, thus giving his Washington Post an inside advantage and opportunity to bemean and libel officials it does not like.

And when I helped my colleagues to pass this House resolution I never dreamed that the employed counsel of said subcommittee would attempt to go beyond the power and authority granted by the House of Representatives.

AUTHORITY LIMITED BY HOUSE

The only authority granted by the House of Representatives to this committee was "to investigate all forms of criminal activity in the District of Columbia, the probable causes for commission of crimes, law enforcement, and law-enforcement agencies, paroles and parole boards, the activities of courts, the conduct of prisons, and to report its investigations to the House, with recommendations for legislation."

The only authority "to recommend" granted by the House to the committee was "recommendations for legislation." The House did not authorize this committee to have an employed counsel "grill his former chief", a United States attorney, with a lot of silly, ridiculous academic questions about his knowledge of something about which this spiteful attorney had the night before prepared foolish questions out of a law book to propound. The House did not authorize this committee to let its hired counsel publicly charge a United States attorney with being "ignorant, totally unfit, and incompetent." It did not authorize this committee or its hired counsel to "demand the removal from office" of a United States attorney or any other official. The House did not authorize this committee to employ a counsel at $225 per month to deliberately insult Members of Congress and other public officials regarding matters wholly disconnected from the subject of crime. The House did not authorize this committee to allow such a hired counsel to grill or lecture Members of Congress for recommending and trying to have deserving public servants justly promoted. If Members of the House of Representatives had known that employed counsel was going to attempt to exceed the authority granted this committee in all of the above particulars, they would never have voted for and passed said resolution.

"DETERMINED TO GET GARNETT AND BROWN"

Almost from the beginning it was clearly apparent to all posted observers that there was a concerted effort being made by William Randolph Hearst's Washington Herald and Washington Times and Eugene Meyer's Washington Post to ruin and hound out of office both United States Attorney Leslie C. Garnett and Maj. Ernest W. Brown, superintendent of the Metropolitan Police.

ADMITTED BY PROMINENT MEMBER OF SUBCOMMITTEE

The Washington Star for April 14, 1935, in reporting a speech made on the night of Friday, April 12, 1935, by our colleague from Indiana, Mr. WILLIAM T. SCHULTE, at the fifth annual meeting of the Central Business Men's Association, mentioned that he was a member of the House Committee to Investigate Crime, and quoted Mr. SCHULTE as follows:

The Representative said he had "positive evidence" that certain persons were "after the scalp" of Superintendent of Police Brown, United States Attorney Garnett, and Chief of Detectives Frank W. S. Burke.

So our colleague had found out just what I found out almost immediately after the investigation began, that powerful influences were after the scalp, and were trying "to get" United States Attorney Garnett, and Superintendent Brown, of the Metropolitan Police, and other high officials. And I found out that it was William Randolph Hearst's Washington Herald and Washington Times, and Eugene Meyer's Washington Post, that had hatched "the plot" and were working in unison, although hating each other, on a concerted scheme of attack. Just as a magnolia bud gradually unfolds, their scheme and plot unfolded from the time steps were formulated to create a crime committee, to have appointed as outside helpers the ones desired by these newspapers to look up and interrogate witnesses who would attack the victims these newspapers wanted harrassed and ruined, and then to play up in scandalous headlines such attacks on their front pages in an attempt to create public sentiment against such officials.

"KEPT PLOT SECRET FROM CRIME COMMITTEE"

The members of the Crime Subcommittee, of course, knew absolutely nothing of this scheme and plot of the Herald, Times, and Post, but these newspapers took advantage of their knowledge of the fact that the chairman of the subcommittee was a great admirer of William Randolph Hearst, whose picture he had hanging up in his office, and that entertaining such friendly and kindly feeling for Hearst he would likely listen to their suggestions. I make no criticism of any member of the Crime Committee; but if the members of this subcommittee had known all the facts they would never have employed John R. Fitzpatrick as their counsel at $225 per month, and they would never have employed the Post reporter, Seals, at $225 per month, and then there would have been no defamation of character of United States Attorney Garnett, Major Brown, and other high officials.

"HE STARTED IT ALL"

The Washington News on April 26, 1935, in heralding the sensational Drastic Shake-up of High Officials and in telling about this Fitzpatrick report, and carrying the pictures of Judge Garnett, Major Brown, and Inspector Headley as the ones whose heads were going to be chopped off, then carried a picture of Fitzpatrick, under which was the name "Counsel Fitzpatrick", and the News under his name printed "He started it all." The News was not well informed. Fitzpatrick was a helper, but he did not "start it all", but he was largely instrumental in helping to "finish it all."

A MOTIVE FOR EVERY PLOT

When I witnessed the determined effort on the part of William Randolph Hearst's Washington newspapers to "get" United States Attorney Garnett, I knew there was a motive, and I began to look for it. At last I found it. Here it is: On Sunday, September 13, 1931, the Washington Herald, on page 2, printed a scandalous, libelous, article about a Methodist preacher in Virginia—Rev. J. Arthur Winn—and tried to involve four good women, wantonly printing their photographs in connection with such attack on this Virginia minister. Rev. J. Arthur Winn employed Hon. Leslie C. Garnett, who was then in the private practice of law, to sue William Randolph Hearst's paper for libel. The suit had to be brought against the Washington Times Co., Inc., as the publisher of the Washington Herald. Judge Garnett brought this suit, not in Washington, where Hearst's papers through daily representing the facts can create prejudice in the minds of Washington citizens who do the jury service here, and his bevy of skillful high-powered lawyers which he keeps on annual retainers know how to select the prejudiced veniremen on the jury, and where this Virginia preacher would have been at a great disadvantage; but Judge Garnett, using his usual good judgment, filed the suit in Alexandria, Va., where Hearst's papers circulate, which gave him jurisdiction in Virginia. This libel suit is styled J. Arthur Winn, plaintiff, against The Washington Times Co., Inc., defendant.

W. RANDOLPH HEARST CONSIDERED GARNETT FORMIDABLE THEN

Mr. William Randolph Hearst then considered Leslie C. Garnett, as a lawyer against him, much abler, and better informed, and more experienced, and greater versed in law than seemingly he now asserts him to be as a United States attorney.

HEARST HAD EIGHT SKILLFUL LAWYERS EMPLOYED TO DEFEND HIM AGAINST JUDGE GARNETT'S SUIT

William Randolph Hearst's counsel of record in this case were Wilton J. Lambert, one of the best and leading lawyers in the United States; Rudolph H. Yeatman; Messrs. Barbour, Keith, McCandlish & Garnett, of which firm Hon. R. Walton Moore, formerly a Member of Congress but who is now Assistant Secretary of State, was a member; and Wilson M. Farr, then commonwealth attorney of Fairfax County, Va.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST OBJECTED TO BEING SUED IN VIRGINIA

Hearst's skillful attorneys raised the question of jurisdiction, and tried to get the court to hold that he could not be sued in Virginia. Extended hearings were held on the jurisdictional plea and Judge Leslie C. Garnett prevailed against Hearst's bevy of eight skillful lawyers, for the court sustained Garnett in bringing the suit in Virginia and decided that question against Hearst.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST PLEADED PRIVILEGE—THAT HE HAD THE RIGHT TO LIBEL A METHODIST PREACHER

Then Hearst's skillful lawyers wasted a lot of time in holding hearings on a plea of privilege they filed for Hearst claiming that as a newspaperman he had the right, without being held accountable, to publish such libelous matters on a Methodist preacher. Again Attorney Leslie C. Garnett was pitted against the eight high-powered lawyers employed by Hearst, and again the court held with Garnett that Hearst's papers did not have such privilege. Then followed a number of other hearings on the pleadings, which were decided by the court in Garnett's favor, and after all of these delays caused by Hearst's lawyers the case was finally set down for trial on its merits before a jury in Alexandria.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST WOULDN'T TRUST JURY

Hearst was not willing to leave the matter to a decision of a Virginia jury as to how much he should pay for libeling a Methodist preacher in Virginia, so he settled the case before trial, and on April 25, 1933, he paid $2,500 to the Methodist preacher, client of Leslie C. Garnett, in settlement. But Hearst also had to pay the fees of his eight high-powered lawyers he had employed to defend him in the suit. And the fact that Leslie C. Garnett whipped him in this libel suit is the motive for the plot and scheme now to ruin Garnett.

WHAT CAUSED FITZPATRICK'S SPLEEN

Just a few weeks before the crime investigation was authorized, Mr. Justice Proctor, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, called United States Attorney Garnett before him, and in open court, told him that his assistant, Mr. John R. Fitzpatrick, had been impudent to the court, and had been insolent in court, and requested Garnett not to allow him to appear in his court again.

RESULTED IN FITZPATRICK'S RESIGNATION

Instead of resigning to his chief, Mr. Garnett, for whom he worked, Fitzpatrick filed his resignation with Hearst's newspapers, and the first information Garnett had about it he saw in the newspaper, but shortly thereafter he received the following from Fitzpatrick:

RESIGNATION

OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES ATTORNEY,
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., November 21, 1934.

Hon. LESLIE C. GARNETT,
United States Attorney.

MY DEAR MR. GARNETT: Having in mind the statement which you made to me this evening to the effect that Mr. Justice Proctor had formally requested you to relieve me from further duty as assistant United States attorney in Criminal Court No. 2, over which he is presiding at the present time, and having in mind also your further statement to the effect that you felt it necessary to accede to his request and that, therefore, commencing on Monday, next, I would be assigned to the civil courts to handle compensation matters, I hereby respectfully tender my resignation as assistant United States district attorney with the request that it be accepted immediately.

I take this occasion to convey to you my sincere appreciation of the personal courtesies which you have extended to me as a member of your staff and I express to you my good wishes for your future welfare.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN FITZPATRICK,
Assistant United States Attorney.

JUST PLAIN JOHN FITZPATRICK, THEN

You will note that he signed his resignation just plain John Fitzpatrick, and did not then put any doctor handle to it. But all through the investigation you will note that he was invariably called "Dr. John R. Fitzpatrick."

WHEN FIRST APPOINTED, DID NOT HAVE LICENSE TO PRACTICE

John R. Fitzpatrick was in a clerical position and was secretary to Justice Frederick L. Siddons from 1925 to September 12, 1929, when Mr. Leo. O. Rover, then United States Attorney, appointed Fitzpatrick as one of his many assistants. At that time, Fitzpatrick was not a lawyer, and did not have a license to practice law, and had never tried a case in his life. He was admitted to the bar here in Washington on September 18, 1929, 6 days after his appointment, and for the first time was then authorized to try a case in the Washington courts. He served under Rover until January 22, 1934, when President Roosevelt appointed Leslie C. Garnett to succeed Rover, and Garnett inherited Fitzpatrick from Rover. And during 6 months and 22 days of the fiscal year of 1934—that is, from July 1, 1933, until January 22, 1934—Fitzpatrick served under Rover.

FITZPATRICK'S FOUR OUTSTANDING CASES

In recounting Fitzpatrick's legal achievements, our colleague from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], on April 3, 1935—RECORD, page 4939—mentioned that Fitzpatrick had prepared and successfully prosecuted cases, and cited as the four outstanding ones "the Brinkler, Wampler, Bowles, and De Benque-Gormley cases." Not ever having heard of Fitzpatrick as a lawyer during my 19 years in Washington, and being acquainted with most of the outstanding lawyers here, and not being very much impressed by any apparent legal ability possessed by him, I was curious to know just what he had really done with these four outstanding cases, hence I requested United States Attorney Garnett to give the facts about same. Here is his letter:

OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES ATTORNEY,
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., April 5, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE BLANTON: In response to your request as to what the records of this office show as to the Brinker, Wampler, Bowles, and de Benque-Gormley cases mentioned by Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH in his speech in the House on Wednesday, April 3, as outstanding cases which Mr. John R. Fitzpatrick, as assistant United States attorney, had tried, I beg to submit the following:

The Brinker case: There was an indictment, no. 53752, against Richard J. Brinker, Charles J. Kay alias Charles K. Brinker, and Elsie A. Cannon, under section 37 of the United States Code, charging a conspiracy to commit the crime of false pretenses and to defraud Father Charles J. Rosensteel, of St. Johns Catholic Church, of the sum of about $37,000. Elsie A. Cannon was the attorney who, with the Brinkers, worked the alleged scheme. There was no actual trial of these cases, but on October 25, 1934, the two Brinkers pleaded guilty to the first count of the indictment, and Mr. Fitzpatrick entered a nolle on that day as against Miss Cannon. No reasons for this nolle appear in the record. In imposing the sentence on the Brinkers, Justice Luhring recommended to the district attorney that Miss Cannon's case be referred to the grievance committee of the bar association for disbarment. Her case has been so referred and is now before that committee.

The evidence in this case was worked up by Mr. Fitzpatrick and Sergt. Earl Hartman, of the Metropolitan Police.

The Wampler case: Wampler was never tried in this jurisdiction; he was prosecuted and convicted in Baltimore by the United States attorney there. The proceedings for his removal from Washington to Baltimore were conducted by Assistant United States Attorney Charles B. Murray.

The Bowles case: Norman S. Bowles was indicted for embezzlement and grand larcency in no. 52745 and no. 52119, respectively. In no. 52745 Bowles defended himself, and Fitzpatrick prosecuted. On March 15, 1933, a verdict of not guilty was rendered on the first count, and the court directed a verdict of not guilty on the second count. In no. 52119 a nolle was entered on the next day, March 16, in view of the verdict in no. 52745, transactions being the same.

The de Benque-Gormley case: There was an indictment for grand larcency, no. 53382. Mr. Fitzpatrick prosecuted this case and a verdict of guilty was found as against each defendant on November 19, 1933. They were both sentenced to the penitentiary on November 27, 1933; however, Gormley thereafter filed a petition for writ of habeas corpus, no. 1713, on the ground of an erroneous sentence, and on February 20, 1934, there was an order discharging the petitioner from his sentence on the ground that the sentence was a void judgment, but the prisoner was remanded to the custody of the United States marshal to the end that the court holding a criminal division might pronounce a sentence upon him in accordance with the law, and he was thereafter resentenced. The habeas-corpus proceedings were defended by Assistant United States Attorney John J. Wilson.

Very truly yours,

LESLIE C. GARNETT,
United States Attorney.

GARNETT'S SIDE OF THE MATTER

I hate injustice wherever I find it. Fitzpatrick's attack upon Garnett is so uncalled for and is so unfair and unjust and scandalous that, since it has been printed into a 55-page document entitled "Report of the Subcommittee on Crime of the Committee on the District of Columbia, House of Representatives, Seventy-fourth Congress", and numerous of such copies may become scattered over the country, and although the report has not been approved by the committee, and will never be approved by the House of Representatives, I thought that it was only just that Mr. Garnett's side of the controversy should be preserved in this RECORD; hence I requested him to give me an exact frank statement of facts that he had not made public.

GARNETT'S STATEMENT

The framework of the subcommittee report and the report itself are so obviously the handiwork of the counsel for the committee that the background of his actions may be interesting.

On November 20, 1934, from an important conference in my office with Treasury officials, I was summoned before Justice Proctor in criminal court no. 2, where a motion to continue for a short time the Buccolo case had been presented by counsel for Mrs. Buccolo. Upon entering the courtroom I was informed by Justice Proctor that my assistant, Mr. Fitzpatrick, had been both insolent and impudent and that he ought to have put him in jail. I naturally expressed my regret that anything unpleasant should have occurred, and after discussion with counsel and with tne court a day certain was set for the Buccolo case. Later in the afternoon I was told by Justice Proctor that this was not the first occasion of insolence on the part of Mr. Fitzpatrick, and that he would be glad if I would relieve him from service in his court. I acceded to this request, and informed Mr. Fitzpatrick that his usefulness in Justice Proctor's court was over, and inasmuch as the other criminal court was functioning smoothly it would be necessary for me to assign him to civil work until the end of the term of the court. He expressed no intention then of resigning. The morning papers carried the information that he had resigned on account of the incident, and I found a sealed envelop on my desk when I arrived at the office containing his resignation, which was immediately accepted. In this letter of resignation is the following assurance from him:

"I take this occasion to convey to you my sincere appreciation of the personal courtesies which you have extended to me as a member of your staff and express to you my good wishes for your future welfare."

Shortly after accepting his resignation he appeared in my office and I expressed to him my surprise that he resigned to the press before he resigned to me. He denied that he had submitted his resignation to the press and could not account for the origin of the newspaper story. I was afterward informed by the newspaper reporters that the story came wholly from him, and that he had discussed it with them for 2 hours. Upon his leaving my office, in accordance with the cordial terms of his letter of resignation, he assured me and he assured Assistant United States Attorneys Pine and Underwood of the same thing—that he had not criticized this office, that he had the kindliest feelings and highest regard for me and that if in the future anyone informed me that he had criticized this office I could count it as a damn lie.

I cannot square his conduct in accepting employment to hold a star-chamber inquisition into cases and transactions in the office during the time which he had been intrusted as assistant, with any rule of conduct that obtains among gentlemen in any profession, and the sinister character of this report gives rise to the grave suspicion of a design to foul his own nest.

And in submitting this report suggesting my removal from office, because of delay in the trial of criminal cases, the chairman of the subcommittee forgets that not only he but other prominent Democratic politicians in West Virginia requested the dismissal of an indictment charging perjury against R. Hugh Jarvis, a prominent West Virginia Democrat, because the first trial of Jarvis had resulted in a hung jury, and, in addition, the day before the subcommittee first met, the day before the Jarvis case, which had been repeatedly continued on Jarvis' behalf, was set for trial the chairman called my first assistant, Mr. Pine, and urged another delay. This request was referred to me and was denied.

Attached hereto is a copy of a letter from Herbert S. Ward, an attorney practicing in this city, who represented Jarvis in the civil case where the alleged perjury was said to have been committed, declaring that Mr. Jarvis had threatened that if I tried this case the second time I would have cause to regret it, coupled with the statement that Mr. RANDOLPH had gone to the Attorney General in the matter.

LETTER FROM HON. HERBERT S. WARD

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1, 1935.

Hon. LESLIE C. GARNETT,
United States Attorney, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GARNETT: I have observed the proposed action of the committee investigating crime conditions in the District of Columbia, with particular reference to their recommendations.

I am interested in this, both from a desire to express my personal appreciation of your conduct of the Office of United States Attorney, and the uncompromising manner in which you have considered and acted upon the several criminal matters which I have taken up with you from time to time.

I have in mind particularly the case of R. Hugh Jarvis, whom I represented in the civil action which resulted in his being indicted. While my several contacts with you were always graciously considered, I was impressed with the fact that you felt it to be your duty to go forward with this prosecution, even in the face of the evidence I then possessed which, to my mind, raised such a probability of doubt as to merit an abandonment of this prosecution. You ordered this prosecution in the face of Mr. Jarvis' statement that he was a close friend and constituent of Congressman RANDOLPH. Mr. Jarvis also stated that Mr. RANDOLPH had urged the Attorney General to postpone the second trial and that if he, Jarvis, was tried a second time, you would have cause to regret it.

In several other cases I have found you equally considerate of matters involving prosecutions which I had occasion to put before you, but, after investigation on your own account, you insisted upon going forward with the prosecutions.

Reserving always the right to differ from you in the conclusions reached, I admired and respected your willingness to consider matters and your adherence to the course of action which you felt was justified.

With kind personal regards, I remain,
Cordially yours,

HERBERT S. WARD.

HERALD AND POST HELP SELECT COUNSEL AND SECRETARY

It is very interesting to remember what Mr. George E. Reedy, who when the Crime Subcommittee first met, appeared before it as a reporter for Hearst's Washington Herald, says about the selection of Fitzpatrick and Seals.

I quote the following from Reedy's statement:

UNIVERSITY CLUB,
Washington, D. C., March 20, 1935.

At the first and subsequent meetings of the subcommittee of the District Committee investigating crime conditions in Washington, I represented the Washington Herald.

At the first meeting of the Crime Committee, I was introduced to a Mr. Seals and he informed me that he was a reporter for the Washington Post. Subsequently, at the time of the appointment of Mr. Fitzpatrick as counsel for the committee, Mr. Seals became investigator for the committee. At the time of my assignment to cover the Crime Committee activities for the Washington Herald, in a conversation with one of the reporters who evidently enjoys the confidence of the city editor, I was told to stay away from BLANTON because he was extremely unfriendly to any of Hearst's representatives.

With reference to the appointment of Mr. Fitzpatrick as counsel for the subcommittee, at the time I knew nothing of the arrangements or what brought it about, except I was informed by Mr. JENNINGS RANDOLPH at a press conference in his office, with other reporters present, that Dr. John R. Fitzpatrick was the man the committee had decided upon as counsel, and asked if he was acceptable to all of the papers. During my conversation with Colonel Yaden (president of the Federated Citizens Associations) he told me that Mr. Seals, of the Washington Post, had talked with him about the appointment of Dr. Fitzpatrick as counsel for the Crime Committee.

So, it would seem that the Herald and Post did have something to do with the selection of Fitzpatrick as counsel, and with the Post reporter, Seals, as secretary, each of whom has since been drawing $225 per month out of the Public Treasury.

LIVED IN WASHINGTON 50 YEARS

THE STERN CO. OF WASHINGTON, INC.,
Washington, D. C., May 3, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have read the published reports of the action of the so-called "Crime Committee", and I want to express my condemnation of them for their harshness in dealing with our United States attorney, Mr. Garnett, and Inspector Albert J. Headley, of the police department, while they were witnesses by this committee.

I also want to express to you that it is my earnest belief that the investigations of this crime committee have demoralized our police force.

This comes to you from a man in business and who has lived here in Washington for 50 years and who is very well acquainted with your private secretary, Mrs. Louise Marks. This is also a compliment to you for your efforts in behalf of this beautiful city.

Thanking you for your continued efforts of these persecuted men, I beg to remain

Respectfully yours,

ABRAM E. STERN.

PRESIDENT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT SAID: "KNOW YE THAT, REPOSING SPECIAL TRUST AND CONFIDENCE IN THE INTEGRITY, ABILITY, AND LEARNING OF LESLIE C. GARNETT."

I want my colleagues to remember that it was President Franklin D. Roosevelt who appointed Leslie C. Garnett a United States attorney, and I want to quote you his Presidential commission, which reads as follows:

Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America
To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, ability, and learning of Leslie C. Garnett, of Maryland, I have nominated and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint him attorney of the United States in and for the District of Columbia, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, the said Leslie C. Garnett, for the term of 4 years, commencing with the date hereof, subject to the conditions prescribed by law.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent and the seal of the Department of Justice to be hereunto affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 19th day of January, A. D. 1934, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and fifty-eighth.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
[SEAL]

HOMER S. CUMMINGS,
Attorney General.

UNFAMILIARITY WITH WASHINGTON CONDITIONS

I do not blame the chairman of the subcommittee. Most of this trouble has arisen because he is young and inexperienced. It was unfortunate that he allowed all five newspapers here to have their reporters present at every meeting, and their photographers present on all occasions to take sensational pictures. These Washington newspapers used the proceedings to furnish daily headlines to sell their papers.

IS THE PRESIDENT WRONG, AND "DOCTOR" FITZPATRICK RIGHT?

It takes lawyers to know a good lawyer. It takes lawyers to know an ethical lawyer. It takes lawyers to recognize legal ability and attainment. You never heard of a good lawyer calling himself "doctor." Now doctors know good doctors. But I would rather have the endorsement of the 1,180 lawyers of Washington as to my legal ability than the endorsement of "Doctor" John R. Fitzpatrick.

President Roosevelt and Attorney General Cummings must have known what they were doing when they selected and appointed Leslie C. Garnett. For I will show you what the 1,180 lawyers of Washington say about his ability:

DISTRICT BAR ASSOCIATION DEFENDS GARNETT

Justly incensed at the unfair, untrue, unjust, and scandalous attacks made upon United States Attorney Leslie C. Garnett in the report prepared and framed by the Post reporter, Seals, and Garnett's former disgruntled assistant, John R. Fitzpatrick, there was a special meeting of the directors of the District Bar Association, which has a membership of 1,100 Washington lawyers, and the bar association, by a unanimous vote, passed the following resolution:

RESOLUTION OF THE DISTRICT BAR ASSOCIATION

Whereas it has been brought to the attention of the board of directors of the Bar Association of the District that the Crime Committee, a subcommittee of the House District Committee, has filed a report with the said District Committee recommending, among other things, the removal of Leslie C. Garnett, Esq., from the position of United States attorney for the District of Columbia on the ground of inefficiency; and

Whereas the board of directors of the bar association is acquainted with Leslie C. Garnett, his record, and ability, both as a lawyer and as United States attorney for the District of Columbia, with the fact that he was formerly Commonwealth's attorney for Mathews County, Va., formerly assistant attorney general for the State of Virginia, and formerly Assistant Attorney General for the United States: and

Whereas the said board of directors has complete confidence in the ability, integrity, and efficiency of the said Leslie C. Garnett: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia vigorously and strenuously opposes the adoption of so much of the report of said subcommittee as recommends the removal from office of Leslie C. Garnett as United States attorney for the District, and urges the District Committee to reject such recommendation made by the said subcommittee, and that copies of this resolution be sent to the Attorney General of the United States and the Chairman of the House District Committee.

BARRISTERS ALSO RESENT LIBELOUS ATTACK

The younger lawyers of Washington have an organization called the Barristers, with a membership of 80 younger Washington lawyers. In a special called meeting, by a unanimous vote, their directors passed the following resolution of confidence:

BARRISTERS' RESOLUTION

The Barristers, in a meeting called for the purpose of considering the criticism of Leslie C. Garnett as United States attorney for the District of Columbia, by unanimous vote declares its absolute confidence in his ability, integrity, and efficient administration of that office, and earnestly urges his retention in office.

One thousand one hundred and eighty lawyers in Washington unanimously say that United States Attorney Leslie C. Garnett is able, competent, learned, and worthy. Dr. John R. Fitzpatrick, who only the last few years got his license to practice, says he is not. Who knows better—1,180 Washington lawyers, or "Doctor" John R. Fitzpatrick? The President of the United States says Garnett is all right. The Attorney General says Garnett is all right. Just who will pay any attention to Dr. John R. Fitzpatrick?

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA RESENT AND REBUKE REPORT

The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is composed of Hon. Alfred A. Wheat, chief justice, and the following distinguished associate justices: Judge Jennings Bailey, Judge Peyton Gordon, Judge Jesse C. Adkins, Judge Oscar R. Luhring, Judge Joseph W. Cox, Judge James M. Proctor, Judge F. Dickinson Letts, and Judge Daniel W. O'Donoghue. The supreme court selected three of its judges, to represent all nine justices of the supreme court, in calling on the Attorney General of the United States, to resent the attack made on Judge Garnett, as shown by the following statement made in the Washington Star this afternoon:

Three justices of the District Supreme Court—Jennings Bailey, James M. Proctor, and Oscar R. Luhring—representing the entire bench of that court, called on Attorney General Cummings in Garnett's behalf yesterday.

Interview confirmed

The delegation declined to comment, but Henry Suydam, special assistant to the Attorney General, made the following announcement:

"A delegation of three justices representing all of the justices of the District Supreme Court called on the Attorney General and made strong representation for Leslie C. Garnett, United States attorney for the District of Columbia. No other statement will be made."

Later, reporters discovered Representative BLANTON, Democrat, of Texas, leaving Cummings' office. He told them the purpose of his visit was to present the Attorney General with a "May Day bouquet."

PROMINENT LAWYER RESENTS FITZPATRICK'S MALICE

Hon. E. Hilton Jackson is one of the prominent lawyers in Washington. He was formerly associated with Judge Garnett in the law practice. He has rebuked Fitzpatrick and his vicious report. I quote the following from this afternoon's issue of the Washington Star:

E. HILTON JACKSON, FORMER ASSOCIATE, PROTESTS TO CUMMINGS

The crime committee report was sharply scored today by E. Hilton Jackson, attorney, former associate of District Attorney Garnett.

Jackson formally protested against the report by writing a letter to Attorney General Cummings, and today issued a statement in which he stoutly defended Garnett.

In his letter to the Attorney General, Jackson said, "It is with profound regret and amazement that I read the report of the Crime Committee, which bears evidence on its face of being largely the work of one who was both prosecutor, judge, and executioner.

Protests process

"It is hardly conceivable that we have fallen upon times where character may be assassinated with impunity and reputation blighted without some semblance at least to due process of law.

"If the committee had contemplated an impartial investigation of Garnett's office", said Jackson, "it is not understood why they should have selected as the 'prosecutor' of this committee an inexperienced former assistant of Garnett, whose separation from the office was precipitated by a controversy between him and one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Regardless of the merits of such separation, an impartial mind is not able to grasp the propriety, under the principles of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, of selecting a potential enemy to act in the dual capacity of prosecutor and judge, a situation implicit in the investigation and findings of the Crime Committee.

Knew Garnett long time

"I have known Mr. Garnett over a long period of years and for several years he was associated with me in my office suite in the practice of law, both in the District of Columbia and in Virginia. During this period I was associated with Mr. Garnett in litigation of the first importance in both jurisdictions, and throughout was in constant conference with him with respect to the most complicated legal matters. As a result of this contact I formed the opinion, which I now entertain, that Mr. Garnett was a lawyer of unusual ability, both in the trial of cases and in conference, and that his approach to all legal questions was characterized by the highest integrity."

In his statement Jackson further praised Garnett, declaring that the office of district attorney in this jurisdiction "is primarily of an administrative and semijudicial character, and that qualifications for the discharge of its duties do not necessarily involve a meticulous memory as to the penalties imposed by a multitude of criminal statutes or the incidental rules of court procedure."

Charges petty questions

The examination of Garnett by the committee, Jackson charged, "was artfully designed to disclose a lack of knowledge of certain details on the part of the district attorney, having nothing to do with the larger and more fundamental aspects of the administration of this important office."

Explaining the office was administrative and semijudicial, Jackson declared: "It is not commonly realized that the district attorney is largely a judicial officer, for by him must be decided the question as to what cases shall be prosecuted and what cases shall be dismissed. He has to examine the evidence and determine in a great many cases whether the evidence shall be produced to the grand jury for an indictment, and after indictments have been made by the grand jury, he has to weigh the evidence to determine whether it is proper to prosecute or to enter a nolle prosequi."

WASHINGTON HERALD'S SILLY AND RIDICULOUS CONTENTION

The Herald contends that bar-association endorsements are not worth much. But when it is sued for libel, it immediately hires eight high-powered lawyers to defend it. And by printing the article I will now quote, it has libeled every member of the Crime Subcommittee, for I do not believe that any Member will subscribe to this Herald doctrine. And I do not believe that the Herald is telling the truth when it attempts to quote a member of such committee, and I dare the Herald to give the name of any member of the committee who said what it says was said. I quote the following from the Herald article:

DISCOUNT SUPPORT

Members of the special committee that condemned Mr. Garnett and Mr. Kindleberger were inclined to discount the activities of lawyers and judges who have visited Attorney General Homer Cummings in Mr. Garnett's behalf, however.

Confident they have enough votes to get the committee report adopted by the House District Committee, they are refraining from public comment.

However, one member said:

"These bar association endorsements aren't worth much as far as I am concerned.

"Everybody knows that lawyers stick together in a pinch. I'm a lawyer myself. I know how it is. The bar association could hardly do less. That's why Attorney General Cummings is trying to get the Government to start an open campaign against crooked lawyers right today.

"He knows how ineffectual bar associations are and how little they like to take stands against their members."

SUPPOSE HEARST COULD NOT GET LAWYERS TO DEFEND HIM

If Leslie C. Garnett, or these other officials who have been libeled by Hearst's papers and the Post, should sue them for $200,000 damages, which they have legal and just rights for doing, it would treat Hearst exactly right, if no lawyer in Washington would accept employment to defend him. If his paper can hatch up such an attack against lawyers as his Herald without warrant prints above, he does not deserve to be represented by lawyers, for whom he has such little respect and regard.

But, before I finish this discussion, Mr. Speaker, I am going to print in this RECORD a sufficient cross-section of the numerous letters I have received from the business men of Washington, not lawyers, to show Hearst and the Post, and Dr. Fitzpatrick, and my colleagues, that the people generally condemn this Fitzpatrick scandalous report.

AN APPEAL TO CONGRESS

HILL'S GARAGE,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Member of Congress, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I wish to register my criticism of the action of the so-called "Crime Investigation Committee" for censuring the United States district attorney, Mr. Leslie C. Garnett, and Inspector Albert Headley. This investigation has ruined our police department, and placed within the minds of our good District of Columbia citizens an unwarranted and unjustified idea that the United States attorney's office and the police department of the District of Columbia are unworthy of further performance of their sacred duties.

As a respected citizen of the United States of America, living in Washington, D. C., all of my life, I am not in agreement with the report of the Crime Investigation Committee, and heartily endorse the disapproval of it, so manifestly made clear by the support of my many dissenting friends.

It is up to the citizens of this voteless community to stand solidly behind the disapproval of the Crime Investigation Committee's report, and I want to add my personal endorsement to the view of those not in agreement with the findings and report of the Crime Investigation Committee of the District of Columbia, insofar as it respects the condemnation singled out to United States District Attorney Leslie C. Garnett and Inspector Albert Headley, both of whom have served their country in trying times admirably. The disapproval of the Crime Investigation Committee's report will also restore the police department of the District of Columbia to its former state of respectability.

It is necessary that the citizens of the United States of America (voteless District of Columbia) take a positive stand in this matter and request that the report of the Crime Investigation Committee be not approved by the House District Committee.

Very sincerely yours,

J. D. HILL.

VARIOUS CITIZENS' ASSOCIATIONS RESENT ATTACK FITZPATRICK'S REPORT MADE AGAINST MAJ. ERNEST W. BROWN

The Washington newspapers yesterday carried a statement made by Mr. Sylvan King, who is a prominent merchant in Washington and the chairman of a committee representing 10 federations or groups of civic bodies in Washington, expressing confidence in the integrity, ability, and service of Maj. Ernest W. Brown, superintendent of police, from which I quote the following:

KING STATEMENT

Mr. King's statement and that of his associates follows:

"As chairman of the joint committees of the following associations, Merchants and Manufacturers' Association, the Washington Board of Trade, the Federation of Citizens' Associations, the Federation of Civic Associations, the Federation of Business Men's Associations, the Federation of Civic Clubs, the Federation of Women's Clubs, the Congress of Parent-Teacher's Associations, the District of Columbia Public Schools Association, the American Automobile Association, and the Keystone Motor Clubs, we represented in great majority the opinion of the people of Washington.

"We have contacted every member of this committee yesterday, and their personal opinion expressed confidence in the integrity, ability, and service of the superintendent of police, Ernest W. Brown.

"The entire committee has personally expressed the wish and hope that Major Brown will be retained.

"(Signed) Sylvan King, Burd Payne, George Plitt, Mrs. Harvey Wiley, Charles Frame, Arthur Smith, Mel Sharpe, Ed Shaw, Mr. Beasley."

MERCHANTS AND MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION DEFEND MAJOR BROWN AGAINST FITZPATRICK'S ATTACK

I quote the following from yesterday's Washington Star, showing that they resent the attempt in the report Fitzpatrick prepared, to oust Major Brown from his position as Superintendent of the Metropolitan Police:

The board of governors of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association took cognizance of the report yesterday and adopted a resolution expressing confidence in the integrity, ability, and service of Police Superintendent Ernest W. Brown.

The resolution also expressed the hope that Major Brown would be retained in the service.

FEDERATION OF CITIZENS ASSOCIATIONS PROTESTS

The Federation of Citizens Associations of Washington met tonight, and the report of such meeting carries the following headlines: "Federation Takes Issue with Crime Probers on Change in Methods", and from same I quote the following excerpts:

Taking direct issue with one recommendation of the House Crime Committee, the Federation of Citizens' Associations last night registered opposition to appointment of officials of the Police Department from outside the ranks of the department.

The House committee proposed that a new chief of police be selected from outside the department. The federation, after a 2-hour debate, adopted a resolution offered by Joseph L. Gammell, chairman of its police and fire committee, stating that no one outside the ranks of the police and fire departments shall be appointed to a place above the rank of private in either the police or fire departments.

CALLED PREPOSTEROUS

Wender denounced the House committee recommendation dealing with an "outside police chief" as "preposterous" and a thing that the federation should "stifle."

Lodge argued that the federation had nothing before it, since the House Crime Committee report as yet had not been released to the general public, and President Yaden explained there was no bill in Congress requiring selection of a new chief of police outside the ranks of the department. After many parliamentary moves, however, the federation by a clear majority voted its opposition to selection of officers of the department except by promotion within its ranks.

The federation adopted another resolution proposing that no one be appointed a private in either the police or fire departments unless he had had residence of 5 years in the District. This was on motion by Sullivan.

GARNETT AN ABLE, EFFICIENT, CONSCIENTIOUS LAWYER

The following letter I have just received from Judge Gus A. Schuldt, who is the presiding judge of the police court, refutes Fitzpatrick's scandalous report:

POLICE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE: Responding to your inquiry relative to District Attorney Garnett would say that I consider him an able, efficient, and conscientious lawyer and capable in every way of performing the important duties of district attorney of this district.

Allow me, also, to take this opportunity to thank you for the deep interest you have manifested in District of Columbia affairs.

Sincerely,

GUS A. SCHULDT,
Presiding Judge.

GARNETT ONE OF THE FINEST LAWYERS

Judge Isaac R. Hitt is one of the able, experienced judges of one of the criminal courts here in Washington. I have just received the following letter from him:

POLICE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am pleased to have received your letter, which indicates that you are making a sincere effort in ascertaining the true facts in connection with the practice before the Police Court of the District of Columbia.

Concerning Mr. Garnett, whom I have known for more than 15 years, I can speak freely and from the heart. I can truthfully say that he is one of the finest lawyers and one of the most perfect gentlemen that it has ever been my pleasure to know. The administration of his office, since his appointment, has been pleasing and gratifying to everyone with whom I have had the opportunity to discuss the matter. Mr. Kindleberger, one of his assistants whom he has assigned to the police court in charge of prosecutions here, has conducted his post courteously and with marked ability. There has never been any occasion where anyone of the assistants, including Mr. Kindleberger or those under his charge, have been reprimanded or criticized by myself or, so far as I know, by any other judge of this court. At the present time the court calendar is current, and the cases are being disposed of with efficiency, ability, and dispatch by Mr. Garnett's aides assigned to this court.

You are to be congratulated, Mr. BLANTON, for your sincere and tireless effort in ascertaining the truth about conditions in this community. Your service will always be remembered by both the bench and bar.

Cordially yours,

ISAAC R. HITT, Judge.

WASHINGTON'S ONE RELIABLE NEWSPAPER

It is most fortunate, indeed, that there is one high-class, reliable newspaper in Washington—the Washington Evening Star—that does not countenance frame-ups upon public officials. It does not enter the plots and schemes of other designing newspapers here in their malicious attempts to ruin good men.

Following the unauthorized printing of the unapproved report prepared by John R. Fitzpatrick and William F. Seals, the dependable Washington Evening Star, on Thursday afternoon, May 2, 1935, had the following to say in a pertinent editorial:

THE CRIME REPORT

With recommendations of the House Crime Committee * * * specifically, asking immediate removal of United States Attorney Garnett and for the retirement of police officers above the rank of captain who are past the age of 60, and replacement of the superintendent of police by someone not now a member of the force—there will be less inclination to agree. And those to whom such recommendations are addressed will naturally insist upon a more convincing demonstration of alleged derelictions by official personnel than is contained in the committee report.

The report accuses Mr. Garnett of incompetence, indifference to official responsibility, and ignorance of the law. His competence might be determined in part by his record as prosecutor, and the committee gives such a record in statistical summary and comment. But the statistics and their interpretation by the committee report are on their face contradictory to those contained in records submitted to the committee through Chief Justice Wheat from the chief clerk of the Supreme Court of the District. The committee report makes no reference to these data, which indicate that Mr. Garnett's record is unusually good. As for the prosecutor's professed ignorance of certain statutes and procedure in local courts, a less candid witness in a less hostile atmosphere might have acquitted himself to better advantage. * * *

So the advantages to be gained in creating morale, esprit de corps, and discipline by forced retirement of the higher police command to make way for another General Glassford experiment leave the reader of the report skeptical and very much in doubt.

That, apparently, is the attitude of the full House District Committee, which, instead of putting rubber-stamp approval on a report which it had not had time fully to digest, wisely laid it aside for the time being to await the printing of the full record of testimony. The status of the report thus remains in doubt. The resolution directing the inquiry provided that the District Committee "as a whole or by subcommittee" should investigate and "report to the House during the present session of Congress the results, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable." The report must, therefore, run the gauntlet not only of the District Committee, but of the House before its findings are accepted as conclusive.

EVEN THE WASHINGTON NEWS ATTACKS REPORT

The Washington News, in an editorial of this afternoon, adversely criticizes the report Fitzpatrick prepared, and from its editorial I quote the following:

The report of the House Crime Subcommittee has advanced some conclusions that do not seem to be supported by the evidence the Representatives had before them. * * *

Careful examination of the report yields insufficient support for these generalizations. * * *

The subcommittee recommends a permanent citizen crime committee to "keep cases" on the police and prosecutors. The mischievousness of such a measure must be apparent. Who could hope to be an efficient chief of police or district attorney with a citizens' committee, officially assigned to meddle, hung around his neck?

Likewise ill considered seems the blanket mandate that police commanders be retired at 60. The wisdom of experience can be very useful in a police organization, as elsewhere. If individuals fail, individuals and not age groups should be dismissed.

SENATOR KING OF UTAH DEFENDS GARNETT

United States Senator WILLIAM H. KING, a distinguished Democrat of Utah, is one of the best-posted men in Washington on conditions in the District of Columbia. He, too, resents the unethical and malicious attack Mr. Fitzpatrick made against his former superior in the report he prepared against United States Attorney Garnett. I quote the following from yesterday's Washington newspapers:

With protests growing against the report of the crime investigating subcommittee, Senator WILLIAM H. KING, (D.), of Utah, took up the cudgels in defense of District Attorney Garnett.

NO JUSTIFICATION

In taking up the defense of the district attorney, Senator KING, who is Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee which approved Mr. Garnett's nomination, explained that, although he did not hear the testimony on which the subcommittee based its denunciation of the district attorney he saw no grounds in the report, in his opinion, justifying the attack.

Pointing out that, as he understands it, the subcommittee based its suggestion that Mr. Garnett be ousted on the grounds that he showed a lack of familiarity with the details of local law procedure, Senator KING, who is recognized as an able jurist, said:

"To say that for this reason he is incompetent and should not be allowed to hold the office is improper. The position that Mr. Garnett holds does not require that he be familiar with the details.

"Mr. Garnett is there in an administrative capacity, and as far as I know he has served well in this capacity.

DETAILS UNNECESSARY

"A man can make a fine district attorney without being closely familiar with the details of the local law procedure. Why, even if a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States were to be made district attorney here, I would venture to say that he would not know the details of the local procedure, but, of course, he would make an excellent district attorney.

"Mr. Garnett came highly recommended, and during his service in the position I have heard no criticism of him, and am of the opinion that he has done a good job. He made several appearances before our committee, once in connection with his proposed law to strengthen the gambling laws here, and he appeared to have a sound understanding of the situation and how it should be coped with."

STAR CHARGES RANDOLPH GAVE UNAPPROVED REPORT TO PRESS

The Washington Star in its issue this afternoon, May 4, 1935, gives out the impression that Representative JENNINGS RANDOLPH assumed that the District Committee would approve the prepared report at its meeting Wednesday, and that he gave copies of said unapproved report to all of the five newspapers in Washington on Tuesday before the District Committee met Wednesday morning, and I quote from today's issue of the Washington Star the following:

Copies of the crime committee report were given to representatives of all five Washington newspapers last Tuesday, the day before the meeting of the full District Committee, at which the document was to be considered. Chairman RANDOLPH, of the Crime Subcommittee, instructed the newspapermen that the report was not to be released for publication until the close of the full District Committee meeting.

CONGRESSMAN WRIGHT PATMAN JUSTLY INCENSED AT ACTION

My distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is a seasoned member of the District of Columbia Committee. He attended this 2-hour executive meeting of the District Committee Wednesday morning, May 1, 1935. He knew of the committee's action in refusing to allow said unapproved scandalous report to be made public. I want to quote his remarks just made this afternoon concerning same, and my colloquy, to show that this unapproved libelous report should not have been published:

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman I hope the House will allow me to make a statement about the Crime Committee report being published.

The District of Columbia Committee, of which I am a member, had a crime subcommittee that made a report a few days ago to the whole committee. It was understood at the time the report was submitted that it was not official; that it would not be considered official until it was approved by the whole committee, if it was ever approved. It was distinctly understood that it would not be given out to the newspapers, and that the newspapers would be asked not to publish it if they had in any way obtained a copy of the report.

I was very much disappointed to see what was alleged to be a report printed in the next morning's paper. I feel like the integrity of the House is involved.

The newspapers were asked not to print the report, as it would not be official if they obtained a copy, since it was not official and would not be official until it was passed on by the whole committee. The whole committee has not passed on it. The whole committee has not examined the report. It has not read the report, and they know nothing about it except what was in the newspapers.

We have not been in a position to give it consideration. It should not have been published.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. While I got a copy, I know that some Members of Congress have tried to get a copy of the report from the District Committee but have been refused a copy. They were told same were all under lock and key. Will the gentleman explain why a confidential report not yet approved by the committee can be given to the newspapers and published, while Members of Congress cannot get it?

Mr. PATMAN. I cannot understand that.

I know that the newspapermen were instructed by the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], the chairman of the committee, not to print any report if they obtained it from any source. They were warned not to print that report. Why they printed it I do not know and, we, the committee, certainly would not agree to a report in a 2-hour session which attacked the reputation of honorable men. We refused to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It was a one-man report, gotten up by a disgruntled former employee of Judge Garnett (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who throughout its entire length, from beginning to end, could not disguise his spleen and malice against Judge Garnett and others. He was out to "get" Garnett and tried to do it. I compared the newspaper print closely with the printed report Fitzpatrick prepared that I have, and I know these newspapers had a copy of it. I congratulate my friend and his District Committee on refusing to approve it.

Mr. PATMAN. Anyway, it is not official, and the printing of the report was not authorized, and I do not think anyone had a right to pass judgment on it until the whole committee passed on it.

Mr. BLANTON. I furnished the United States district attorney, Judge Garnett, with a copy of it because it viciously and maliciously attacked him and he had a right to see it to defend himself, as he is an appointee of the President of the United States, and such an unwarranted attack was a reflection on the President, and our Department of Justice.

When Fitzpatrick maliciously attacked Judge Garnett as a law officer of Washington, and he did it unjustly, and he printed his malicious report prematurely, and he did it without authority, he has done more to break down respect for law and the morale of law enforcement than you can undo in 10 years, and that is just what he has done by publishing his attack. More has been done to break down law enforcement here by preparing and printing that unauthorized report than anything that could have been done. Fitzpatrick has demoralized law enforcement in Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman does not mean that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] had anything to do with it?

Mr. BLANTON. No; certainly not. It was Mr. PATMAN, Mr. WERNER, and other wise members on the District Committee, with sound, splendid, good judgment, who refused to approve Fitzpatrick's malicious report, and, with Chairman NORTON, ordered that it should not be printed until the committee could examine the hearings and have time to digest and pass on it. And I commend the District Committee for taking such action.

MINORITY OF SUBCOMMITTEE AGAINST REPORT

Said Crime Subcommittee had eight members on it. There was a minority against the report prepared by Mr. Fitzpatrick. Our distinguished colleague from South Dakota, Mr. WERNER, had not even had time to prepare the minority views against said Fitzpatrick report when it was submitted to the District Committee last Wednesday for consideration, and wantonly printed before it had been approved. He has just now obtained leave of the House to have until next Friday to prepare and print such minority views, which is shown by his request the House has just granted, which I quote:

Mr. WERNER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of subcommittee of the District of Columbia Committee, which, under resolution passed by the House, investigated crime conditions in the District of Columbia, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until next Friday to file minority views.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

LIFETIME CHARACTER AND GOOD REPUTATIONS INVOLVED

Mr. Speaker, this subject I am discussing is of momentous importance. It involves a defense of good reputation and character public officials have striven for a lifetime to upbuild without blemish. This Fitzpatrick report is a reflection upon our Democratic President in the White House. It is a reflection upon our Attorney General of the United States. It involves the integrity of the great Democratic Party; it, as my colleague [Mr. PATMAN], well said, involves the integrity of this House of Representatives and the Congress.

But for the above, I would not use so much time and take up so much space in the RECORD. But since this "Doctor" Fitzpatrick has accumulated a record of 2,000 pages in this hearing, which voluminous record is now being printed at public expense in the Government Printing Office, and since this silly, ridiculous report he has already prepared, and has already had printed, embraces 55 printed pages, seeking to ruin and destroy United States Attorney Garnett and other high officials, I deem it well worth my time, and well worth the space it will cover in the RECORD, to put all of the facts, and what leading business men of Washington think about it, before my colleagues in the House and Senate.

EULOGIZING FITZPATRICK AND SEALS

Most of page 2 of this unapproved report eulogizes "Doctor" John R. Fitzpatrick, counsel, and Mr. William F. Seals, secretary, to the Crime Committee, each paid $225 per month. I quote this from the report:

With funds provided for its expenses, the subcommittee appointed a counsel, a secretary, and a clerk, as follows:

(a) Counsel, appointed February 12, 1935; salary, $225 a month.

(b) Clerk, appointed February 16, 1935; salary, $120 a month.

(c) Secretary, appointed February 17, 1935; salary, $225 a month.

The only other items of expense incurred were for ordinary stationery and supplies.

Counsel: Applications were received from approximately 100 attorneys who sought appointment as counsel to the subcommittee. These applications were in writing, in person, and by telephone.

After a painstaking survey, during which the District of Columbia Bar Association, civic leaders, and civic organizations were asked for opinions in the matter, Dr. John R. Fitzpatrick, dean of law at Columbus University and former assistant United States district attorney was appointed as counsel to the subcommittee.

SCURRILOUS REPORT PREPARED BY FITZPATRICK AND SEALS

The Washington Times, the Washington Star, the Washington News, the Washington Herald, and the Washington Post all advised their readers that this 55-page printed report was prepared by "Doctor" John R. Fitzpatrick and Mr. William F. Seals.

The Washington News, in its final "red star" edition, on May 1, 1935, said:

Seals and Committee Counsel John R. Fitzpatrick were responsible for the drafting of the report.

And the following is also quoted from said edition of the Washington News:

The District Committee was in session for almost 2 hours this morning, deliberating the report, but decided to withhold its approval until all members of the committee have had an opportunity to review the testimony that was introduced during the crime committee's hearings.

It was decided to have the hearings printed and distribute copies to each member of the committee.

Shortly after the meeting of the full committee this morning, Representative THEODORE WERNER (Democrat, S. Dak.) made known his opposition to the report.

"I wish it understood that I do not concur with the conclusions of the report in many instances", he said.

This was construed by observers to mean that he is not in accord with the views as to Garnett, Kindleberger, Brown, Headley, and Bean.

DISGRUNTLED FITZPATRICK GETTING BACK AT HIS CHIEF

The following is what "Doctor" Fitzpatrick had to say against his former employer, United States Attorney Leslie C. Garnett:

Ideal qualifications cited: The person charged with the grave duties and responsibilities of the United States attorney for the District of Columbia should be (1) an attorney who possesses a creditable record as a trial lawyer; (2) he should have a broad knowledge and thorough understanding of Federal and District of Columbia laws and procedure; (3) he should possess the vigor and energy to personally prosecute dangerous criminals; (4) he should command the confidence and respect of the bench, the bar, his subordinates, and the citizens of the community; (5) he should, by his official conduct and his personal behavior, personify the dignity and the majesty of the law; (6) he should, by persistent and adamant prosecution of criminals, symbolize the power of the Government to condemn and punish enemies of society; (7) he should possess the executive and administrative ability and the qualifications of leadership to organize a capable, hard-working, and efficient staff that would emulate his own courageous and competent conduct.

Garnett should be removed: The immediate replacement of Leslie C. Garnett by a prosecutor possessing the attributes described above, would do as much to reduce the frequency of crime in Washington as would the adoption at this time of any single remedy.

Mr. Garnett's testimony before the subcommittee, and the testimony of his assistant, Mr. Karl W. Kindleberger, clearly indicate that the affairs of the office of the United States attorney for the District of Columbia are being conducted without adequate knowledge of the law, without proper or efficient supervision, and minus an attitude conducive to public confidence and respect.

Garnett and Kindleberger found incompetent: The foregoing detailed testimony of Mr. Garnett, contrasted with the inserted facts, proves beyond peradventure that the United States attorney for the District of Columbia is not only incompetent but that he is indifferent to the responsibilities of his office.

With such a person in charge of the prosecution of criminal cases in Washington, it is not possible to afford the people of this city the protection against crime for which they pay and to which they are by right entitled.

The subcommittee wishes at this point to emphatically reiterate its opinion that Mr. Garnett should be removed without delay and that a competent official should be appointed to succeed him.

There are undoubtedly many faults which should be speedily corrected in the administration of the various departments of the United States attorney's office. It is the opinion of the subcommittee that the assistant United States attorney in charge of police court, Mr. Karl W. Kindleberger, is totally unfit for the office he now holds and that he should be immediately removed. It is not deemed necessary to go into the detailed testimony of Mr. Kindleberger. It was established to the entire satisfaction of the subcommittee, through his testimony and that of other witnesses, that Mr. Kindleberger is hampered in the proper discharge of his duties and that he does not command the confidence and respect of the community.

JUST WHERE DID "DOCTOR" FITZPATRICK GET SO MUCH AUTHORITY?

Who gave Fitzpatrick authority to prepare such a report? Nobody! The House did not give any such authority to the committee.

Remember that Fitzpatrick was appointed as "counsel" for the subcommittee on February 12, 1935, and one of the first things he did was to have his former chief, Garnett, summoned before him as a witness, so that he could "grill" him. And then the Washington Herald was in its glory. I quote the following from the Herald for Tuesday morning, February 19, 1935, which after big headlines on its front page, "Grilled at Quiz", stated:

Leslie C. Garnett, United States district attorney, startled a congressional inquiry yesterday three times by damaging admissions concerning the conduct of his office.

Visibly shaken and nervous, he replied in answer to questions:

1. That without any legal sanction, he had revealed to the House Military Affairs Committee confidential testimony to the grand jury concerning the War Department fraud investigation in 1934.

2. That John R. Fitzpatrick, his questioner, counsel for the committee before which Mr. Garnett was testifying, knows more about phases of the criminal code here than he does.

3. That he thinks Lt. George Little, head of the police vice squad, is courageous, and capable at battering down doors and moving out furniture in gambling joints.

Mr. Garnett was instructed to appear before the committee again today and probably tomorrow also as Mr. Fitzpatrick indicated he will delve into every ramification of the district attorney's duties.

The district attorney's explosive answers to insistent prodding by the counsel were sharply contrasted by Mr. Fitzpatrick's cool, impersonal demeanor in dealing with his ex-chief.

Mr. Fitzpatrick opened the hearing by asking Mr. Garnett if reports the district attorney has objected to appearing before the committee were true. Mr. Garnett denied this, and Mr. Fitzpatrick then got his admission that he turned over the grand-jury records to the War Department graft case without authority. Mr. Fitzpatrick asked him if he thought that might have effect on people who appear before the grand jury hereafter, and Mr. Garnett replied by asking what that had to do with the suppression of crime.

DID NOT TURN OVER GRAND-JURY REPORT WITHOUT LEGAL SANCTION

When I read the above, Mr. Speaker, I was greatly amused. I happened to know about that grand-jury report. When Mr. Collins, of Mississippi, was chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, which has charge of the bill that makes appropriations for the War Department, I was a member and helped Mr. Collins hold the hearings. We needed that grand-jury report. Our committee ordered Mr. Garnett to bring that grand-jury report before us. He brought it, but refused to deliver it to us, claiming that it was confidential. We passed a resolution to compel him to turn it over to the committtee, and he complied by turning it over. And it was ridiculous for "Doctor" Fitzpatrick to make it appear that Mr. Garnett had done something wrong.

SILLY QUESTIONS

It is like witnessing a cheap comedy to listen to some of the questions Fitzpatrick "grilled" United States Attorney Garnett with. Here are some of them:

You are familiar with the bad-check statute, are you not? When you speak of housebreaking, sir, perhaps the committee would be interested in knowing just what our housebreaking statute covers?

And public money is now being spent to print 2,000 pages of such hearings that will not be worth 5 cents to the people.

DAILY PHOTOGRAPHS

And then the Herald carried a large picture of "Doctor" Fitzpatrick, and a large picture of Mr. Garnett, with the following in large type: "Garnett Admits Quiz Counsel Knows Criminal Statutes Better" just above the picture, and just below the pictures was printed the following:

HEARST'S HERALD DID NOT PRINT ONE QUESTION

It was left to the News to tell us of one question asked by "Doctor" Fitzpatrick, which did not suit him. I quote from the News of February 19, 1935:

Asked by counsel if any complaint had been lodged against his assistants, Mr. Garnett replied:

"The only complaint I ever had was from Judge Proctor concerning John R. Fitzpatrick, a former assistant."

He was asked to discuss details of the charges made against Dr. Fitzpatrick. He said:

"I don't think it is up to this committee to inquire into details of what the court told me. I insist that this has nothing to do with the crime situation in Washington."

But being pressed about what Judge Proctor told him, Garnett said: "I was told Fitzpatrick was impudent and insubordinate."

DELIBERATE ATTEMPT TO DISTORT

Mr. Fitzpatrick devoted parts of pages 21 and 22 of his spiteful report in trying to make it appear that Hon. H. Winship Wheatley had criticized Mr. Garnett but immediately upon learning of the distortion through the newspapers, Mr. Wheatley, who is president of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia, published the following statement in the press denying Mr. Fitzpatrick's contention:

GARNETT DEFENDED

H. Winship Wheatley, president of the District Bar Association, said the House Crime Committee in its report tried to "read into his testimony a criticism of United States Attorney Leslie C. Garnett" he did not intend to make. He declared:

"I had no intention of saying indirectly what I would not have said directly.

"When interrogated by the committee I assumed the committee wanted my personal knowledge. My practice has not brought me in contact with the district attorney's office since Mr. Garnett was appointed. If I had thought the committee desired hearsay, I would have told them my information from a number of Washington lawyers of standing is that Mr. Garnett is a gentleman and a lawyer of ability. My personal experience with him indicates the same."

A FALSE, CLAMOROUS, AND DISGRACEFUL DOCUMENT

The Rosslyn Chronicle, of Rosslyn, Va., an ably edited and well-known newspaper published by Mr. Glen M. Hearin, just across the Potomac River from Washington, and whose patrons are mostly business men of Washington, in its issue published yesterday, May 3, 1935, carried an apropos editorial about this report prepared by Mr. Fitzpatrick. The editorial writer for this newspaper is an able, distinguished lawyer, who formerly was a Commonwealth attorney for the State of Virginia. He says this Fitzpatrick report is "a false, clamorous, and disgraceful document", and he says the attack on Garnett is "an unwarranted and damnable outrage." I quote the editorial, as follows:

[From the Rosslyn (Va.) Chronicle of May 3, 1935]

THE CRIME COMMITTEE EXPLODES

The House Committee on the District of Columbia appointed a subcommittee to investigate the conditions as regards crime in Washington. The committee, instead of investigating the cause and ascertaining the cure of crime at the seat of government, conducted a sort of investigation that could accomplish nothing constructive, and its report is like that of a policeman who was endeavoring to vent his spleen and satisfy his grudges against the Superintendent of Police and his experienced assistants and against the United States attorney. Superintendent of Police Brown, a man of sterling honesty, worked himself up from the ranks after a lifetime of police duty and by sheer merit, and he is regarded as the most capable and one of the cleanest officers who ever held the position of Superintendent of Police.

The committee's malevolent attack on United States Attorney Garnett is an unwarranted and damnable outrage, and no person who has made a profession of the black art of defamation, and who has speculated in assaults upon the honor of stainless characters, could vie with that committee in spreading calumny. All through the report run vindictive malice and uncalled for insult. Stress is laid upon such trifling things as the failure of the United States attorney to recall that jurors in the police court serve but 2 weeks, and that the juvenile court had certain responsibilities, and other equally unimportant matters. Assisting the committee was a former police-court assistant to the United States attorney, who had been retained in his office by Colonel Garnett, through characteristic kindness. Justice Proctor of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, had complained to Colonel Garnett that because he, Justice Proctor, had continued a case for a short time on account of illness of Attorney Wilton J. Lambert, and the engagement of the other defense lawyer in another court, that this assistant to Colonel Garnett had been insulting and insolent to the court, and the assistant resigned, like the preacher resigned when the bishop was about to stop his pay.

He was employed by the Crime Committee at a trifling compensation, and upon the appearance of Colonel Garnett before the committee he showed an attitude of insinuation and insult to his former chief who had treated him with every consideration and kindness.

Had the committee shown an unprejudiced desire to know the standing and capability of Colonel Garnett they could have called the judges of the Supreme Court, the leaders of the bar, and the law officers of the Government departments, and the committee would have learned that Colonel Garnett was a high type of man, and a lawyer of exceptional learning and ability, an attorney of the highest standing at the bar enjoying not only the confidence and esteem of the bench and bar but of the Attorney General of the United States and the President himself.

In another column of this newspaper we print the enviable record of United States Attorney Garnett. This record was obtained from official files by a representative of the Evening Star newspaper and, when published, made such a profound impression on the Attorney General that he sent it to the President as an evidence of fidelity to duty and outstanding public service.

The report of the committee is a false, clamorous, and disgraceful document and will make no impression on the bench or bar except to discredit the committee that used its opportunity to defame a deserving public servant and a good man.

WASHINGTON STAR EDITORIALLY CONDEMNS FITZPATRICK REPORT

In a strong editorial in its issue of May 3, 1935, the Washington Star censures Fitzpatrick for inaccuracies and for leaving out of his report all of the facts given by Chief Justice Wheat upholding the splendid record of District Attorney Garnett, from which editorial I quote the following:

Mr. Garnett's reply

District Attorney Garnett's reply to the Crime Committee's charges against him and his office fully justifies the House District Committee in having delayed action on the report. Statements and conclusions in Mr. Garnett's letter are sharply contradictory to those contained in the report, a fact which demands full and satisfactory explanation.

While the report bases certain of its conclusions as to laxity and delay in prosecutions on the testimony of lay witnesses who offered no evidence, statistical or otherwise, in support of their charges, the committee members had before them the testimony of Chief Justice Wheat, which included statistics from court records as to the disposition of criminal cases. Why the committee report failed to make any mention of this testimony—which would ordinarily be regarded as the only acceptable evidence in the form of official statistics—and relied upon other statistics, the source of which is not given, should be explained, together with apparent discrepancies in * * *

But the even more important statistics indicate that of 1,244 cases started during the fiscal year 1934, 1,166 were terminated, and of those terminated there were 166 convictions, 756 pleas of guilty, and 49 acquittals. With grand juries returning an average of 120 indictments a month during the fiscal year 1934, only 67 cases remained to be tried at the close of that year. That does not indicate to the layman a degree of delay that would justify a conclusion of laxity in bringing cases to trial.

The contents of Mr. Garnett's letter suggests the propriety of another investigation by the full House committee into the basis of statements and conclusions in the report. Innuendo and suggestion have no proper place, of course, in any fact-finding report. Some of Mr. Garnett's explanations of suggestions written into the report would indicate that fair use was not made of readily available facts.

"TACTICS AND TREATMENT DEMORALIZED POLICE FORCE"

I have just received the following letter from Mr. Isaac Furman, of the Terminal Meat Market, 1101 F Street SW., condemning this report prepared by Mr. Fitzpatrick as unfair criticism of Inspector Headley and Judge Garnett and stating that such "tactics and treatment demoralized the police force":

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I wish to take this means of condemning the action of the so-called "Crime Committee" in their unfair criticism of Inspector Headley and United States Attorney Garnett; the treatment of them was indeed brusque and most unfair.

I wish to further criticize this committee, whose tactics and treatment, in my opinion, demoralized the police force, on whom our citizens naturally must depend.

I trust that you will take some action to prevent these objectionable recommendations from being carried out in the future.

Yours very truly,

ISAAC FURMAN.

"INTERFERENCE MAY PROVE DISASTROUS"

I have just received the following complaint from Mr. H. J. Taltavull, another well-known business man of Washington, registering his protest against the unfair treatment accorded Mr. Garnett and Inspector Headley:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 3, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington. D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I want to register my complaint against the so-called "Crime Committee" because of the treatment of Mr. Garnett, the United States attorney, and that veteran policeman, Inspector Albert J. Headley, accorded them by this committee.

I desire also to say that the so-called "investigation" has very seriously affected the morale of the police force, and further interference may prove disastrous. You are one Member of Congress who can be depended upon at all times.

Very sincerely yours,

H. J. TALTAVULL.

"WHOLE AIM SEEMED TO BE TO DISCREDIT"

I have just received the following letter from Mr. Fred A. Berlin, secretary of the National Board of Trade, with offices here in Washington, and he says that it was unfortunate that the subcommittee picked as its counsel "a discharged employee of the district attorney's office, and the whole aim seemed to be to discredit District Attorney Leslie C. Garnett":

NATIONAL BOARD OF TRADE,
Washington, D. C., May 3, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: We note from the press this morning that you are going to oppose the acceptance by the House of Representatives, the District subcommittee report covering hearings on the crime in Washington, and we feel that something should be done to prevent the acceptance of this report and are in accord with your move to that end.

It would appear that the Subcommittee Investigating Crime in the District of Columbia were unfortunate enough to pick a discharged employee of the district attorney's office and the whole aim seemed to be to discredit District Attorney Leslie C. Garnett.

The National Board of Trade had been investigating the crime conditions here for nearly a year prior to the formation of the Crime Commission, as we knew that a congressional investigation was inevitable, and you will please note the enclosed reproduction of our comments about the police department dated August 13, 1933.

Attached hereto, you will find copy of letter to Representative RANDOLPH, asking that the National Board of Trade be heard before the crime committee. This letter was never acknowledged, and when about March 1, I talked to Representative RANDOLPH he immediately turned me over to the committee counsel who refused to discuss the matter, but turned me over to the assistant counsel, a Mr. Seals. Mr. Seals informed me that the commission was quite capable of making their own investigations, and told me in a polite way that the information we had would not be presented to the committee. From various newspapermen I was told, from time to time, that "I knew too much", and would not be called before the committee, which apparently was the case.

The National Board of Trade offered to furnish, at its own expense, a capable attorney, not identified with lawbreakers, or racketeering organizations, in order that the findings would be a true crime investigation, but this offer was refused by Representative RANDOLPH. We decline at this time to comment on the findings of the Crime Commission, but as a Member of the House of Representatives, may we urge upon you the necessity for a crime investigation in the District of Columbia, which will bring out the real facts, and one directed by counsel who will not turn down important information which might not be strictly in accord with his own personal views. We feel that this is of vital importance and will, at our own expense if necessary, furnish capable counsel for such investigation.

Yours very truly,

NATIONAL BOARD OF TRADE.
FRED A. BERLIN, Secretary.

"DOCTOR" FITZPATRICK INTERFERING WITH ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

From the 55-page printed report Fitzpatrick has prepared against Garnett and others, I quote the following from page 24, where he tried to unjustly criticize the United States attorney:

PREVIOUS LACK OF ACTION AGAINST GAMBLERS

Question. In view of the local situation, as it has been reflected in the press and over the radio and so on, with reference to gambling, why were not those 33 cases expedited and actually tried and gotten out of the way?

Mr. GARNETT. Because we wanted to try the Sam Beard case first (S. T., p. 319).

SAM BEARD IS THE WASHINGTON KING OF GAMBLERS

The following will show just why United States Attorney General Garnett decided to try the Sam Beard case first, rather than others "Doctor" Fitzpatrick thought ought to be tried:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 24, 1935]

BEARD RECEIVES SPECIFIC DATA IN GAMING CASE—UNITED STATES SUPPLIES LIST OF 18 PLACES HERE ALLEGEDLY INVOLVED IN "PLOT"

Forced to reveal its hand through a bill of particulars, the Government has furnished Sam R. Beard and his 13 codefendants with a list of 18 places where it is alleged they conspired in "the setting up and keeping of gaming tables, gaming devices, and gaming places."

The list was revealed when Roger Robb, assistant United States attorney in charge of the prosecution, was directed by Justice James M. Proctor to draw up a list of the specific offenses that would be shown in his trial.

In accordance with the order, Robb has given Beard's attorney, John J. Sirica, a list showing the addresses where alleged offenses either occurred or were about to occur.

The addresses are: Room 508, Mather Building; 605 Pennsylvania Avenue NW.; 718 Eighteenth Street NW.; 1319 Wisconsin Avenue NW.; 1319 F Street NW.; 833 Fourteenth Street NW.; 804 North Capitol Street; 10 H Street NE.; 1405 L Street NW.; 519 Ninth Street NW.; 742½ Ninth Street NW.; 722 Thirteenth Street NW.; 939 D Street NW.; 792 O Street NW.; 522 Eighth Street NW.; 514 Tenth Street NW.; 1417 New York Avenue NW.; 922 F Street NW.; and "divers other places" to the grand jury unknown.

Indicted on three counts

Beard and the others were indicted on 3 counts, the first 2 charging the setting up of a gaming table and the setting up of a gaming place, and alleging a conspiracy to violate the gaming laws.

Beard was arrested several months ago. His trial had been postponed numerous times because of attacks on the indictments, the defense claiming it was illegal because a woman on the indicting grand jury was serving unlawfully. Following that another indictment was returned, and it, too, was attacked.

The latest move, one to force the Government to acquaint Beard with the nature of the charge against him so he could properly prepare his defense, has resulted in the removal of his case from the trial calendar.

Was arrested in raid

This was brought about by the necessity of investigating all of the places listed.

Beard was arrested in a raid on the Mather Building, where police claimed they seized 60 phones, each with sufficient outlets to make possible 1,600 simultaneous calls. Mr. Robb said he hoped to be able to show that race-track information was sent out throughout Washington over the telephonic system.

Removal of Beard's trial from the calendar means he probably will not be brought to face the charges until after the Easter recess. He is at liberty on a $9,000 bond.

FITZPATRICK'S REPORT DEMORALIZES LAW ENFORCEMENT

Assistants of United States Attorney Garnett are now prosecuting this notorious gambler, Sam Beard, here in Washington, for conducting 17 branch gambling houses in 17 different places in Washington during this week; and since this unapproved report gotten up by Mr. Fitzpatrick attacking the United States attorney and the superintendent, assistant superintendent, and inspector of the police department, the court has been forced to threaten and punish for contempt John J. Sirica, attorney for this gambler, Beard, for repeated attacks Sirica has made on Garnett's assistants prosecuting the case.

And tonight's Washington Times, on its front page, in large headlines printed in black-faced type an inch high running across the entire front page, carries the assertion gamblers are betting 10 to 1 that Beard will not be convicted. This illustrates very forcibly just how such an unwise, silly report, attacking faithful, competent officers of the law, will inevitably demoralize all law enforcement. But I predict that Beard and his 12 codefendants will be convicted. Concerning this case I quote the following from the Washington Star:

"If the dice which the Government offered are crooked," Beard said, "they were 'planted.' I know nothing of crooked dice, or of any of the contents of the safe."

Justice Cox yesterday overruled a motion of Sirica's to strike from evidence all testimony bearing on contents of the safe. Assistant United States Attorney Roger Robb explained to the court he had opened the safe on his belief that a felony had been committed and because no one had come forward to claim ownership of the strong box.

The Government contends it has proved that Beard was the proprietor of a gambling syndicate having branch agencies in at least 17 places at the time the 13 defendants were arrested, October 5, in a fifth-floor suite of the Mather Building, 900 block of G Street.

"BRANCH JOINTS" CLAIMED

In support of this they have offered in testimony a list of 17 telephones traced to the alleged "branch joints" and marked with code numbers. The prosecution contends that the code numbers appeared on racing slips made out in the Beard place and also were given by operatives whose bets telephoned to the main office were overheard by Government wire tappers.

And from the Washington News of May 1, 1935, the following is quoted:

DICE ARE INTRODUCED AGAINST SAM BEARD

A tin box filled with sets of alleged crooked dice was introduced late today as evidence in the gambling trial of Sam Beard and 12 others in District Supreme Court.

Chief Deputy Marshal Thomas Ott testified that the dice, a dice cup, and several hundred slips of paper which he said were betting slips were taken from safes in Beard's National Amusement Co. office in the Mather Building, 916 G Street NW.

BEATING THE DEVIL AROUND THE STUMP

In an attempt to get rid of Major Brown, superintendent of police, and Inspector Headley and Inspector Bean, Fitzpatrick wrote all of the following in his report on page 14, knowing that they were the only three officers who would come within the provisions of such recommendations, to wit:

Present high command exhausted: Purely in the interest of affording the people of Washington the best possible police protection, it is nothing more than good judgment to take the administration of the police department out of the hands of officials who have given to the city the best years of their lives and who, because of advancing age, are no longer able to provide the character of energetic leadership that must be had if the department is to be operated at its maximum efficiency.

The work of a good police officer is arduous and exhausting. Those who have risen through the ranks by virtue of their devotion to service and because of their ability to assume increasing responsibilities are the ones who have probably exerted the greatest amount of physical and mental energy. These officers have given to their tasks not only the best years of their lives, but their service to the community has exhausted their physical and mental resources. For many years most of them have worked without regard to schedule of hours. They have worked Sundays, holidays, and at times continuously for weeks without a single day of relaxation. It is not uncommon for ranking officials of the police department to devote as much as 14 or 16 hours a day to their duties. No man can devote himself so unsparingly to such trying work as that of police administration and continue indefinitely to be forceful and efficient.

It is not only fair and just to these officers that they be retired, but from the standpoint of good common sense and self-protection the District of Columbia should place them on the retired list and replace them with younger and more vigorous men.

Immediate retirement of high ranking officers: Translating the foregoing into definite opinion, the subcommittee suggests that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia immediately retire from active service at least all officers above the rank of captain who have reached the age of 60 years and who, in accordance with the existing law, as found in title 20, section 584, page 238, of the Code of the District of Columbia, complete to March 4, 1929, may be retired in the discretion of the Commissioners.

The subcommittee feels that in connection with the appointment of a successor to the major and superintendent that careful and serious consideration should be given to the advisability of selecting a competent and qualified person who is not now a member of the police department.

WHO GAVE "DOCTOR" FITZPATRICK SUCH AUTHORITY?

The House of Representatives gave no such authority either to the committee or to Fitzpatrick, and it was presumption on his part to make such recommendations to the Commissioners. Only Congress can do that, and Congress is the House and Senate. Even if the District Committee were to unanimously approve his report, the Commissioners would not be bound by it, because they take their directions from Congress and laws passed. Bills unanimously approved and reported by the District Committee have failed to pass in the House.

THE REAL PURPOSE OF IT ALL

The following ridiculous and unauthorized recommendation on page 15 of said report disclosed the real reason for the above:

Headley censured on "gentleman's agreement" and laxity: While Inspector Albert J. Headley comes within the category of police officials over 60 years of age, and by virtue of that fact subject to retirement at the discretion of the Commissioners, the subcommittee is impelled to comment specifically on the service of Inspector Headley as revealed by his testimony, the testimony of others, and additional information in its possession.

WHO GAVE "DOCTOR" FITZPATRICK AUTHORITY TO CENSURE?

The House of Representatives did not give the committee any authority to attempt to censure anybody. Yet "Doctor" Fitzpatrick attempts to censure an honest, faithful, efficient police officer who has loyally served the Metropolitan Police for the past 39 years.

The District of Columbia Legislative Committee by an organic police act, had authorized two assistant superintendents of police. They could be appointed only when the Congress appropriated the money. Congress had appropriated the money for one assistant, but only one.

In the early part of 1934 an attempt was made by the District to have an appropriation made for the second authorized assistant. The matter came up before the Subcommittee on Appropriations, of which our distinguished colleague from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] is chairman, and I am a member. I refused to agree to it. Chairman CANNON refused to agree to it. And we passed the bill without it. When the Senate passed the bill they inserted this money for the second assistant. In conference Chairman CANNON and I were forced to accept it, as the Senate would not recede from its amendment. And the money was provided for a second assistant superintendent of police.

NATURALLY WANTED A GOOD MAN IN THE PLACE

Two outstanding police officers were, through seniority, in line for the position, namely Inspector Headley and Inspector Bean. When the Gibson committee was trying to clear up rottenness in Washington several years ago, I was a member of his committee. He is now in the United States Senate from Vermont. Inspector Headley then rendered us invaluable service. We found him to be honest, reliable, fearless, and dependable.

Without his knowing anything whatever about it, a number of his friends, including some prominent business men, met me in my office to take steps to have Inspector Headley promoted to this position. It was the office seeking the man. We had absolute confidence in him. And after the meeting we notified Headley that we wanted him in the new position.

But we learned that the friends of Inspector Bean were also active in his behalf. They met with us and told us that Inspector Bean was in bad health, was fixing to retire and move to Florida, as he could not stand another winter in Washington, but that after serving 39 years he was poor and financially hard up, and specially wanted the promotion so that when he retired his retired pay would be some larger, and these friends of Bean's asked the friends of Headley to allow him to have the position, and then he would retire in a short time, and then Inspector Headley could get it, as he was the next man in line for it, having also served about 39 years.

We advised Inspector Headley of what the friends of Bean proposed and asked him if it would be all right with him, and he generously agreed for us to stand him aside for his old friend and police pal, and without Headley knowing anything about it, we, his friends, agreed to help Bean get it.

And on behalf of the many friends of Inspector Headley, and without his knowing anything about it, until it was all done, I had a meeting with Superintendent Brown, and had a gentleman's agreement with him that we would back Bean for the position, but that when Bean retired he would give the position to Inspector Headley, who was next in line through seniority.

It was the good of the service that all of us had in mind. We wanted to get a man with Headley's fine characteristics in the position. Everything about the matter was open and above board, as we had confidence in Major Brown. Not one thing was done by Inspector Headley about the entire matter. It was all done by his friends.

LETTERS REGARDING THE AGREEMENT

When Congress adjourned, and I had gone back to Texas, the following correspondence passed between Superintendent Brown and myself, and Inspector Headley knew nothing about it until it was over, and I mailed such letters to him to show him exactly what was the situation, to wit:

ABILENE, TEX., August 4, 1934.

Maj. ERNEST W. BROWN,
Superintendent Metropolitan Police Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MAJOR BROWN: You will remember the gentlemen's agreement we had that the assistant superintendent only wanted to hold the office a short time and would then retire and that you would then give the place to Inspector Albert J. Headley. I am counting on you to carry out this agreement and would appreciate your advising me just how soon this change will be effected.

Very sincerely yours,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT,
August 8, 1934.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Abilene, Tex.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I am in receipt of your letter of the 4th instant in which you refer to our conversation some months ago in connection with the position of assistant superintendent of police, in which it was our understanding that there would be a vacancy in this position very shortly, due to the retirement of one of the assistant superintendents.

In reply, permit me to advise that it is my understanding that one of the assistant superintendents contemplates retiring in the very near future, and although he has not mentioned it to me, through other sources he has made the statement that he would not continue in the service again during cold weather, and in the event this vacancy occurs our agreement will be carried out as discussed by us in your office.

It may be of interest to you to know that Inspector Headley is rendering me a most efficient service and is cooperating fully in bringing about improvements in the department.

I trust you are able to obtain a little rest from your arduous duties during the past session of Congress and your campaign for renomination.

I intended writing you before expressing the congratulations and best wishes of the membership of the police department on your renomination, which we know is equivalent to your election as a Member of Congress.

With personal best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

ERNEST W. BROWN,
Major and Superintendent.

ABILENE, TEX., August 15, 1934.

Hon. ERNEST W. BROWN,
Major and Superintendent Metropolitan Police Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MAJOR BROWN: Thank you for your letter of the 8th instant. In it you use the following language:

"It was our understanding that there would be a vacancy in this position very shortly due to the retirement of one of the assistant superintendents."

The above does not quite state the understanding. It was distinctly stated by you that the one who was to be appointed to this specific position provided for in that bill only wanted the position for a few months, as he intended to retire, anyway, and only wanted it for the purpose of increasing his retirement pay. And I was assured that he would retire in a few months, and I am counting on you to see that he keeps his agreement and does retire at an early date, because he has now held the position longer than was contemplated at the time we had our gentlemen's agreement.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Your friend,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT,
August 25, 1934.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Abilene, Tex.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I am in receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, and before replying, I have endeavored to obtain, if possible, definite information as to the approximate time of retirement of one of our assistant superintendents, and the best information at this time is that he contemplates asking for retirement in the next few months, possibly around January 1.

It was my understanding when we discussed this matter in your office that he contemplated retiring before cold weather.

I have already taken this matter up with Commissioner Hazen and advised him of our agreement in this matter, and as soon as we have the vacancy everything is arranged for the promotion of Inspector Headley to the position; and I want you to know that the agreement between us will be carried out, as I am most anxious to do something for Inspector Headley, especially in view of our many years of association together in the department; and I most certainly appreciate your interest in this, a matter of mutual interest to both of us.

Reciprocating your kind personal regards, I am, as ever,
Your friend,

ERNEST W. BROWN,
Major and Superintendent.

FINE ITALIAN HAND OF NEWSPAPERS

Snoopers for the Washington newspapers who did not like my attitude toward their many attempts to get money out of the Federal Treasury, happened to learn from Bean that I had written to Major Brown about Headley succeeding him when he retired, and Bean was summoned before the committee for "Doctor" Fitzpatrick to examine him. And then the press tried to make it appear that I was trying to force Bean to retire when he did not want to retire. And for 2 weeks they attacked me until they made themselves so ridiculous they stopped when I went on the floor and exposed them.

PROMPTLY WENT BEFORE COMMITTEE

Exercising the privilege that every Member has when he is maligned, I promptly went before the committee and demanded my right to make a statement. I sent for Major Brown and Inspector Headley, and had Headley bring me the correspondence I had had with Major Brown, above quoted, which I had mailed him from Texas, and to my surprise "Doctor" Fitzpatrick objected to Major Brown and Inspector Headley remaining in the room, and they were forced to go out.

The first thing I did was to present the 2 letters I had written Major Brown and the 2 replies he had written me, to have them go into the record, and to my surprise "Doctor" Fitzpatrick sought to do what Judge Proctor said he had done in his court, get impudent and insolent, as will be shown from the following quoted from the Washington Star of March 15, 1935:

BLANTON GRILLED

Fitzpatrick asked of BLANTON: "Why were you so interested in having Bean retired?"

In answer, BLANTON went over his previous testimony about friends telling him Bean could not live another winter in Washington, and explained he wanted Bean retired so Bean could get more money.

"Why", asked Fitzpatrick, "was Major Brown telling you all this?"

"Because we had a gentlemen's agreement", responded BLANTON.

"Why did you have a gentlemen's agreement?" Fitzpatrick asked.

"What are you doing here, trying to find out crime conditions in the District or stir up trouble in Congress?" BLANTON asked, looking at Fitzpatrick. "I am a Member of Congress", BLANTON shouted, and intimated that if necessary he would take this case to the floor of the House.

Fitzpatrick sallied: "You may be a Member of Congress, but you're just another witness here."

In the midst of the excitement Fitzpatrick looked at BLANTON and said:

"What are you doing here; trying to show your authority?"

"Oh, hell, no", BLANTON replied.

WHO GAVE AUTHORITY FOR SUCH GRILLING?

The House of Representatives gave no such authority to the committee to "grill" Members about matters wholly disconnected from the subject matter of said resolution. He had no such authority to insult Members. Of course, he knew that he was pleasing the Washington newspapers responsible for his appointment, but he had no right to assume such authority.

EVERY STATEMENT ABOUT HEADLEY FALSE

Fitzpatrick in his report said that Headley's "quest for promotion" was prejudicial to the best interests of the department. There was no quest for promotion. It was Headley's many friends seeking to place him in this new position for the good of the service. Here is what Fitzpatrick charged, which I quote from his 55-page printed report:

The subcommittee recognizes the fact that under our present form of government, the practice of political endorsements is generally accepted. It does not comment upon the propriety or impropriety of this practice. However, it does find that the conduct and attitude of Inspector Headley in his quest for promotion, was, to say the least, prejudicial to the best interests of the department.

Furthermore, his attitude toward his subordinates, his neglect of duty as District inspector, as indicated by his failure to take action in connection with the deplorable conditions in precinct no. 5, and his evasiveness and lack of candor when appearing as a witness before the subcommittee, all contribute to the conclusion that his services have been unsatisfactory and conducive to a lack of efficiency and harmony.

It is the hope of the subcommittee that its censure of Inspector Headley may be construed by all members of the force now and in time to come as a condemnation of so-called "gentlemen's agreements" of the type in which Inspector Headley participated, and which was revealed during the hearing.

ATTEMPTED SLAP AT ME

When Fitzpatrick and his newspapers put the above in his report he knew that it was a deliberate slap at me. What right had Fitzpatrick to give any such instructions to the police force for all time to come. The committee itself had no such right. And the subcommittee had less authority. The House of Representatives has no such right. It takes the Congress of the United States to make any such ruling. There have been such gentlemen's agreements for the last 150 years, and there will be more just like them for the next 150 years.

CHAIRMAN CANNON REBUKES PUBLISHERS OF LIES

When Washington newspapers were asserting that Fitzpatrick had shown that I had placed a provision in the appropriation bill for an assistant superintendent in order to have one of my friends appointed, my good friend and colleague from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the committee that frames this bill, took the floor on his own volition and showed the true facts, and I quote his remarks from the RECORD of March 28, 1935, pages 4639–4640.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, * * * how far beside the facts many of the reports circulated in this connection have been is indicated by one to the effect that Judge BLANTON was instrumental in placing in the bill provision for an additional assistant superintendent of the Metropolitan Police Department. As a matter of fact, Mr. BLANTON opposed the provision. When the Budget estimates were received last year they provided for two assistant superintendents instead of one. The committee, with the approval of Judge BLANTON, rejected the recommendation and provided for one assistant superintendent, as in former years. But when the bill went to the Senate the additional assistant superintendent was incorporated in the bill and the House agreed to it in conference. The charge is that Judge BLANTON supported the item, when the truth is he voted against it both in the committee and in the House.

Again, the statement of Judge BLANTON that the committee was apprised of the operation of a gambling establishment a block from the Capitol has been questioned both in the papers and in hearings before another committee. All members of our committee will agree that this information was given us on two different occasions, and that a reputable employee of the Government testified before the committee, giving the street address and describing the building in which the place was being operated. He informed the committee that this house was running in full blast, that it had been running for over a year, and that it was equipped with various gambling devices and was widely patronized.

May I say, while I am discussing this matter, Mr. Speaker, that a great deal is printed in the local papers about this committee and this bill which is erroneous. I have no doubt that it is reported to the papers and they print it in good faith, but the fact remains that much of it is, to say the least, misleading. For example, the papers carry articles which would lead readers to infer that the committee has reduced the number of police here in the District, and that it reduced the appropriations for the support of the police department. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, the committee has made more officers available. It gave the Commissioners every man they asked. It gave them every dollar they suggested for the support of the police department. The committee recommended and the House provided the full Budget estimate. The number of men available for police duty in Washington is larger under the pending bill and the amount provided for its maintenance is higher than at any time in the history of the city, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Speaker, I have not conferred with Judge BLANTON about these matters. I merely make this statement in order to keep the RECORD straight. He is one of the most useful members on the committee. His intimate knowledge of District affairs, his indefatigable industry, and his long service on the bench make him one of the most valuable members of the committee and the House. [Applause.]

"INSPECTOR ALBERT J. HEADLEY A FINE MAN, A FINE POLICE OFFICER, IS UPRIGHT, SQUARE, HONEST, AND HAS FAITHFULLY SERVED DISTRICT ABOUT 40 YEARS"

I have just received the following letter from Mr. Edward Alonzo Hayden, whose firm of E. A. Hayden & Co. has been in the automobile accessories business and U. S. L. battery agency for 37 years in Washington, who says that after the "long lifetime of faithful service as a police officer, it would be inhuman and outrageous to treat Inspector Albert J. Headley as Mr. Fitzpatrick provides in his prejudiced report":

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Member of Congress, House of Representatives.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I am in business at no. 331 Pennsylvania Avenue SE., in the fifth police precinct. I was born in Washington, have raised 13 children here, and all have gone through the Washington schools, and I have been in business here continuously for the past 37 years. I ought to know a great deal about the affairs of Washington.

The unfair treatment accorded to Inspector Albert J. Headley by the crime committee is unjust and unwarranted. All of Inspector Headley's numerous friends here consider it an outrage and absolutely inexcusable, and we demand that this protest be placed before Congress.

Why did you Congressmen permit Mr. Fitzpatrick to act for the committee? Any ordinary person who has followed press accounts of this hearing has plainly seen his prejudice and malice. We learn that he is a disgruntled former employee of Mr. Garnett's office, and that he had it in for Mr. Garnett and police officers. He should not have served. He was a prejudiced juror to start with. He had every advantage of Mr. Garnett and Inspector Headley, when he was allowed to frame up questions on him.

Inspector Headley is a fine man. He is a fine police officer. He is upright and square. He is honest. I know that he treats his fellowman right. He has faithfully served this District for about 40 years, and has always been true and steadfast, and neither Mr. Fitzpatrick nor any committee can all of a sudden destroy his fine character and good reputation. His many friends are dissatisfied with the unjust slur Mr. Fitzpatrick has tried to place upon him. We think that Mrs. NORTON and her committee ought to throw this Fitzpatrick report in the wastebasket.

Instead of helping the crime situation in Washington, as we had hoped would be done, we believe that Mr. Fitzpatrick has hurt and demoralized law enforcement. He has hurt the morale of the entire police department. He has encouraged the crooks and lawbreakers to have contempt for our officers of the law. After a long lifetime of faithful service as a police officer, it would be inhuman and outrageous to treat Inspector Albert J. Headley as Mr. Fitzpatrick provides in his prejudiced report. You wouldn't treat a common dog so unjustly. We friends of Headley demand justice.

Very truly yours,

EDWARD ALONZO HAYDEN.

FALSE CHARGE OF EVASIVENESS AND LACK OF CANDOR

Fitzpatrick had the audacity to charge Inspector Albert J. Headley with evasiveness and lack of candor while a witness before the subcommittee. The whole trouble was that suspicious "Doctor" Fitzpatrick did not understand anything about a gentlemen's agreement, and kept trying to make Inspector Headley "know something" that he never heard before. For instance, he wanted to know why Headley did not bring the letters to the committee that passed between Major Brown and me, and why he gave them to me. They were letters about Headley, which I have quoted above, and which I had mailed to Headley for his information, from Texas. Naturally, when Fitzpatrick had Bean testify that I had written Brown a letter about his retirement, I telephoned Headley that morning when I was going before the committee, and asked him to bring me the letters so I could present them to the committee.

And the first thing I did when I appeared before the committee, in the presence of both Inspector Headley and Major Brown, I presented all four of the letters to the committee without anybody connected with the committee knowing that I had them. Yet in that afternoon's Washington Times appeared the following ridiculous lie:

[From the Washington Times, Mar. 16, 1935]

After long and careful questioning by the committee counsel, "Doctor" John R. Fitzpatrick, BLANTON admitted making a "gentlemen's agreement" with Major Brown that Inspector Headley would be promoted as soon as a vacancy occurred.

WRIGGLES UNDER QUESTIONS

Wriggling under the verbal barrage, Mr. BLANTON time after time refused to answer questions. BLANTON became incensed at "Doctor" Fitzpatrick when the latter, aroused to a fighting pitch, drove question after question in the hope of trapping Mr. BLANTON.

Mr. THEODORE B. WERNER (D.), of South Dakota, told his colleagues Mr. BLANTON "should not be put on the spot."

And the above was the ridiculous lie the Washington Times spread all over Washington, right in the face of the fact that, without Fitzpatrick having asked me a question, the first thing I did when I appeared was to put all four of said letters into the record.

IMAGINED OTHER LETTERS EXISTED

Yet Fitzpatrick, in an attempt to furnish copy for the newspapers, plied Inspector Headley with question after question about other letters I had written him, when none existed, and about letters Headley had written me about the position, when none existed. And because Headley could not furnish imaginary letters that did not exist, Fitzpatrick got mad, lost his temper, and did what he lost his position with Garnett for doing in Judge Proctor's court—got impudent and insolent.

DEPLORABLE CONDITIONS IN PRECINCT NO. 5

Fitzpatrick charges Inspector Headley with "failure to take action in connection with the deplorable conditions in precinct no. 5." It was not Headley who failed. It was "Doctor" Fitzpatrick himself who failed.

I quote from the Washington Herald of March 24, 1935, the following testimony given by Captain Morgan of said fifth precinct:

Captain Morgan said: "When I came to the precinct in January, Inspector Albert Headley told me that the place had been running for a year and that he wanted it closed."

Now remember, Captain Morgan went to that precinct the first of January. Morgan says "When I came to the precinct in January, Inspector Albert Headley told me the place (meaning the gambling joint afterward raided) had been running for a year, and that he wanted it closed." That was long before the Crime Committee was created or appointed. That was in January 1935, when Morgan was first transferred there the first of the year. Headley, nor no one else then knew there would be a crime committee. So please keep this in mind, as this magnolia unfolds, and I show you all the facts.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN POLICE TRIAL BOARDS

I have made a close study of police affairs in Washington for 18 years. I helped Senator GIBSON, of Vermont, conduct the famous Fenning investigation, that forced the resignation of Col. Frederick A. Fenning. I had long ago reached the conclusion that with the present trial-board procedure, where crooked policemen are tried before a board of policemen, and there is not power to remove any one of them, no matter how crooked he is, unless he is convicted by this board of policemen, that we will never have law-enforcement in Washington until we change the system. And for several years, in each Congress I have had a bill before the District Committee, seeking to change this ridiculous system, and provide an unbiased trial board, so that we can get the crooked policemen off the force, and I have never yet been able to get the District Committee to report the bill.

WENT BEFORE CRIME COMMITTEE

So as soon as the Crime Committee had been fairly well organized I went to the chairman on January 31, 1935, and asked to come before the committee the next day to present my bill. To my surprise, when I read the morning paper, there was quite an erroneous write-up about my appearing before the Crime Committee to give sensational evidence, and on my arrival at the committee I was again surprised to find the committee room full of newspaper reporters and a bevy of newspaper photographers there to play me up. I advised the chairman that I would not appear unless he had these photographers leave the room and would assure me that I would not be photographed before the committee as I was testifying. He gave me this assurance and had the photographers retire.

To my great surprise, there appeared in Hearst's papers a photograph of me taken from behind me, where I could not see the photographer, and later an article was written by Mr. John Snure, Jr., which appeared in Hearst's paper, stating that while I was testifying a prominent member of the committee had motioned to the photographer behind me to go ahead and take my picture.

I had called Major Brown and had him appear to hear what I had to say, and the following is the report made by the Washington Times:

BLANTON ASKS CIVILIAN POLICE-TRIAL BOARD—ASSERTS CRIME WILL CONTINUE AS LONG AS PRESENT SET-UP IS ALLOWED TO REMAIN

From the lips of a fiery Texan, appearing before a special House Committee Investigating Crime Conditions in Washington, flowed charges today that local police are protecting gamblers.

Representative THOMAS L. BLANTON (Democrat), of Texas, self-styled "best friend a good policeman has", appearing as a witness at his own request, startled the subcommittee with the assertion that collusion between the criminal element and Washington police officers will continue as long as there is a police-trial board.

Asks Civilian Board

Representative BLANTON consumed the major portion of his 15 minutes on the witness stand in pleading for enactment of his bill which would take the trial board from the power of the police department and place it under supervision of a civilian board to be appointed by the President. Mr. BLANTON said:

"For 12 years I was a member of this committee, and I made a thorough study of all departments, especially the police department. Among the 1,300 or more policemen we have in Washington, there are some of the finest men available.

"But we find some off-color, black sheep among them. Whenever you have crooks in the police department, it affects the morale of every man on the force.

"The police board is composed of police who are fellow-officers of the men brought before them. I have seen innocent men framed, and I have seen guilty men go free.

The Washington Post stated that I was asked the question: "You think then, that some police here are protecting these establishments?" And that I replied:

"You think then, that some police here are protecting these

"Oh", cried Mr. BLANTON, "there is no question about it. Whenever you find an open gambling house you can know that either the police captain and the policeman on the beat are crooked or they are numskulls who ought to be kicked off the force.

I cited specific instances where innocent policemen had been framed by crooks on the force, convicted and discharged, and also where guilty police officers of high standing, with their guilt confessed in writing over their own signatures and in their own handwriting, had been tried and acquitted.

Then off the record, on this February 1, 1935, I told the Crime Committee that an employee of the Government had appeared before our Appropriation Committee for the District, and testified that within a block of where the committee was then holding hearings there was a notorious gambling house in full blast, with all of its gambling paraphernalia, full of gamblers all the time, and had been running for a year. And I had Superintendent Brown there to hear what I said about it. That was on February 1, 1935.

A TIPPED-OFF RAID

Remember Captain Morgan testified that as soon as he went to no. 5 the first part of January, Inspector Albert Headley told him there was such a gambling house there, and instructed him to close it. Yet nothing was done until I made this complaint on February 1, 1935.

Captain Morgan and his lieutenant pulled off a raid, set for the specific time of 2 o'clock, but at 10: 30 that morning, nearby merchants were told it was going to be pulled off, so when it was pulled off at 2 o'clock, with spectators there to see it, naturally they found the place empty.

A REAL RAID

But on February 6, 1935, there was a real raid, when a splendid officer named Little cut his way into this gambling house with axes, and took charge of all the gambling devices, apprehended 59 gamblers, and closed up the place. I quote the following from Hearst's Washington Herald for February 7, 1935:

AXES SMASH GAMING DEN NEAR CAPITOL—9 HELD ON CHARGES, 50 OTHERS QUESTIONED; RACE, NUMBERS SLIPS SEIZED

Police smashed down literally "in the shadow of the Capitol" yesterday to wreck one of the largest places yet raided in the campaign against gambling.

The raid at 113 B Street SE. netted the arrests of 59 persons and capture of racing and numbers slips, craps tables, and other instruments used in gaming, as well as a large quantity of money.

Jailed for line-up

Lt. George Little, head of the vice squad, led the raiders who had to smash through heavily barricaded doors. All 59 persons were hauled to police headquarters and locked up in "the cage."

Nine of the men arrested were charged with setting up gaming and held in $2,000 bond each. They gave their names to police as Charles Turner, 45, 1300 block of East Capitol Street; John M. Cornell, 31, 900 block of East Capitol Street; Edgar J. Behrle, 39, 900 block of E Street NE.; Fred A. Stillman, 42, 1700 block of P Street NW; Kenneth T. Pumphrey, 29, 400 block of Fifteenth Street NW.; John E. Goetz, 36, 1600 block of Q Street NW.; Wilmer M. Long, 28, 700 block of Nineteenth Street NE.; and Frederick G. Lynn, 51, 500 block of Fifth Street NW.

Fifty are released

Approximately 50 men found in the place were released as Government witnesses.

Police confiscated $2,127 in cash, two barricaded doors, a quantity of gambling books and slips, 1,200 number books, a pool table, radio, two desk phones, one ear phone, one power pack for a radio, a small dice table, a stool, an electric heater, and a ventilator.

The raided place, visible from the windows of the room in which the District Crime Investigating Committee is holding hearings, apparently had been preparing for a land-office business.

The third floor, on which the crowd was located, had been braced with heavy stanchions. Automatic locks were set on all doors and close identification was demanded of all persons.

Maj. Ernest Brown, superintendent of police, said that the raid was the culmination of 2 weeks' investigation. He said:

"Representative TOM BLANTON said recently that he knew of a place operating in the shadow of the Capitol Dome. I believe this is the one he was talking about."

Several weeks ago police of the fifth precinct tried to raid the place, but there apparently had been a tip-off, for when the squad arrived they found nothing. Yesterday, however, things were in full swing, according to police.

Subject of inquiry

Details concerning this raid will be given the Crime Investigating Committee of the House, it was stated. The committee, under the chairmanship of Representative JENNINGS RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, reconvenes Friday with full subpena power and finances to delve into the whole matter of police, courts, and crime.

YET CRIME COMMITTEE WAITED 6 WEEKS

That real raid occurred February 6, 1935. Yet the Crime Committee waited until the latter part of March to investigate that tip-off.

"INSPECTOR HEADLEY HAD BEEN GRYING ABOUT THIS PLACE SO LONG"

And when the Crime Committee had Captain Morgan and his Detective Salkeld before it on March 23, 1935, to tell about the tip-off, I quote from the Washington Post of March 24, 1935, showing that Salkeld testified:

"Inspector Headley had been crying about this place so long", Salkeld said, "I knew he was going to ask about it."

And you will remember that the Herald for February 7, 1935, said that the Crime Committee was going to take charge of the investigation of this tip-off raid, and the real raid, yet Fitzpatrick blamed Inspector Headley for inaction, when the evidence shows that he is the only one of the 1,306 policemen in Washington who ever started the move to have this place closed up, before the Crime Committee was ever created.

EVIDENCE OF THE TIP-OFF

From the Washington Times of March 26, 1935, I quote the following evidence from one witness who was tipped off:

Mr. Fred was the second witness.

Asked if he had a conversation with Capt. Joseph Morgan, of the fifth precinct, shortly after the B Street raid, Mr. Fred said:

"I went to see the captain on another matter. He said something about being sorry his men hadn't gotten anything in the raid. I told him:

"'You know why.'

"He asked what I meant and I told him someone passing along B Street on the morning of the day the raid was made had said:

"'Be around about 2 o'clock today and you'll see a raid.'"

Captain Morgan testified that on the morning the raid was arranged, it was about 10 o'clock, and no one but he and Detective Salkeld knew about it. It was set for 2 p. m. And he said that it was either he or Salkeld, because no one else knew about it.

Suddenly Fitzpatrick referred back to the B Street gaming house and asked, "Who was the tip-off?"

"The only man it could have been was Salkeld", said Morgan.

"Did you bring charges against him?" asked Fitzpatrick.

"No; I did not", said the captain.

Captain Morgan also testified:

At roll call on February 20 I told the men that an ugly rumor had come to me from a citizen after the raid at 113 B Street SE.; that he had spoken to Mike Sesso (reputed proprietor of the establishment) and said, "Why don't you stop or the police will get you", and Sesso replied, "I've got all the police on the beat fixed except O'Neill, and he's too dumb."

YET INSPECTOR ONLY ONE CENSURED

Many centuries ago the bearer of bad news was beheaded. Because Inspector Headley did his duty and commanded Morgan last January to close up this gambling house he is now beheaded by "Doctor" Fitzpatrick.

NO SENATOR OR CONGRESSMAN CAN EVER AGAIN ENDORSE ANYBODY

Is there any Congressman, after reading and digesting the following recommendation made by Fitzpatrick, going to ever endorse anything in this report? Here is what the Washington newspapers, who have always been jealous of Senators and Congressmen getting appointments for their friends, have been trying to take away from Senators and Congressmen for years:

Political endorsements: Subscribing to the theory that the local police department should be absolutely free from politics, and with the view of eliminating the practice of political endorsements, which has a tendency to undermine the merit system, the subcommittee strongly suggests that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia formulate, adopt, and insert in the police regulations a rule to the effect that it shall be the duty of the major and superintendent of police, when a political endorsement is received for any member of the force, to make the fact and the substance of such endorsement public.

So hereafter, if we are fools enough to approve the above, Congressman JENNINGS RANDOLPH will have his endorsements of policemen published in the Washington newspapers as soon as he makes them.

Fitzpatrick had the audacity to allow attending reporters to put the following in their papers: In the Star for March 20, 1935, under headlines: Further BLANTON Activity Studied by Crime Group, and under subheadlines: House Committee Seeks Data on Varney Promotion Case, over the following article:

Another police department case in which Representative BLANTON, Democrat, of Texas, is reported to have interested himself, was under investigation today by the Special Crime Committee of the House.

Information has been given the committee that BLANTON communicated with Police Superintendent Brown with respect to Lt. Frank A. Varney for promotion.

Lieutenant Varney is expected to be called before the committee to explain the case.

And in speaking about "Doctor" Fitzpatrick worrying BLANTON, the Washington News of March 21, 1935, had this to say about my facing "a new probe":

Faces new probe

However, his worries are not over yet as far as the present probe is concerned, it has been learned.

While the committee has put aside temporarily the matter of the Texan injecting himself into local police promotion, another case supposedly involving similar activities on his part is yet to be unveiled by the committee.

It is alleged that Mr. BLANTON has attempted to seek a promotion for Lt. Frank Varney, but that the matter has never developed.

Correspondence relative to this subject is said to have been carried on between the Representative and Major Brown, and this will be brought before the committee.

And, simply because I had endorsed Varney for promotion, "Doctor" Fitzpatrick had the audacity to summon Varney before the committee, but in the meantime learning that his own employer, Chairman RANDOLPH, was the first one to endorse Varney, and that several others had endorsed him, including a Senator, he adjourned the meeting, and would not let Varney testify.

HERE ARE VARNEY'S ENDORSERS

MARCH 30, 1934.

Hon. MELVIN C. HAZEN,
District Commissioner, District Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAZEN: This letter is written in behalf of Mr. Frank A. Varney, who is a lieutenant of the police force, but wishes to become a captain for the vacancy which I understand will exist. I trust he can be given most careful consideration.

With kind personal regards, I am, very sincerely yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

APRIL 2, 1934.

Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
Member of Congress, House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN RANDOLPH: Referring to your letter of the 30th ultimo, written in behalf of Lt. Frank A. Varney for promotion to the grade of captain, Metropolitan Police, District of Columbia, permit me to advise that the recent vacancy occurring in the rank of inspector was filled by the advancement of an acting inspector to the full pay of an inspector, in keeping with the economy program, and resulting in but one promotion instead of four, and assuring the District of Columbia of the same measure of patrol service as heretofore.

Major Brown further informs me that in the event of a vacancy to be filled in the grade of captain, every consideration possible will be given Lieutenant Varney, your interest in him being kept in mind.

Thanking you for writing me concerning this officer, and reciprocating your kind personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

MELVIN C. HAZEN,
Commissioner, District of Columbia.

APRIL 7, 1934.

Hon. ERNEST W. BROWN,
Major and Superintendent Metropolitan Police,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MAJOR BROWN: I understand that Lt. Frank A. Varney stands first on the civil-service eligible list to be made a captain in your department. I would appreciate your seeing that he is given due consideration and made a captain at the earliest date possible.

With kind regards, I am,

Your friend, THOMAS L. BLANTON.

APRIL 14, 1934.

Mr. GEORGE E. ALLEN,
Commissioner, District Government,
District Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GEORGE: Perry Howard has spoken to me about Lt. F. A. Varney, of the twelfth precinct.

From what Perry tells me, Lieutenant Varney is in line for a promotion to a captaincy and if the superintendent of police recommends this promotion, I sincerely hope that you will do everything you can to have it effected.

With best wishes, I am, sincerely yours,

PAT HARRISON.

Hon. MELVIN C. HAZEN,
President of Board of Commissioners,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COMMISSIONER: I understand that Lt. Frank A. Varney is first on the eligible list for captain in the Metropolitan Police, Washington.

Many of my friends here in Washington have told me of Mr. Varney's record and excellent work. If opportunity presents itself, will you not give him serious consideration?

Very truly yours,

D. LANE POWERS.

Hon. MELVIN C. HAZEN, APRIL 13, 1934.
Commissioner, District of Columbia,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAZEN: I understand that a vacancy exists in the police department in the office of captain of police.

My attention has been directed to the qualifications of Lt. Frank A. Varney, who, I believe, is first on the eligible list of the civil-service applicants. From authentic reports which have come to me, I feel warranted in presenting the claims of Lieutenant Varney to you for consideration for promotion. I am persuaded that this promotion will be for the benefit of the service.

Thanking you for such favorable consideration as you can give to this subject, with kind personal regards, I am,

Very truly yours,

J. W. DITTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 19, 1934.

Senator PAT HARRISON:
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am taking the liberty of referring your letter of April 14 on behalf of Lt. F. A. Varney to Commissioner Hazen, who has immediate supervision over the police department.

I am sure Commissioner Hazen will give the lieutenant every consideration when this matter comes up for action.

With all best wishes, I remain, sincerely yours,

(Signed) GEORGE E. ALLEN,
Commissioner, D. C.

THIS CENSURING "DOCTOR" FITZPATRICK

When he thought I was the only one who had endorsed Varney, Fitzpatrick was going to probe me, without any authority, without any reason, without any excuse, and he was playing me up in the newspapers as if I had done something wrong, but as soon as he found out that Congressman RANDOLPH, his chairman, and Senator PAT HARRISON, of Mississippi, the Democratic whip in the Senate, and Congressman POWERS, and Congressman DITTER, all had endorsed Varney, he dropped his probe like a hot brick.

TRIED TO SCARE COMMISSIONER HAZEN

Fitzpatrick tried to make Commissioner Hazen testify that nothing had been said to him by Major Brown about promoting Inspector Headley when Bean retired, but I quote from the Washington Herald of March 20, 1935, what it gives as Hazen's testimony:

Major Brown asked me one time last winter or fall, I can't be sure when, if I had any objections against Inspector Headley succeeding Bean, when Inspector Bean would retire.

I told him that since Inspector Headley was the next senior in point of service and there was no reason why not, I had no objections. At that time, I recall, he said that Representative BLANTON favored Inspector Headley to succeed Bean.

Yet "Doctor" Fitzpatrick wasted 8 days before this committee trying to show that there was something out of the way for me to want Inspector Headley justly promoted. Hazen says Inspector Headley deserves the position and should succeed Bean. Major Brown, superintendent of police, says so. Everybody else says so except "Doctor" Fitzpatrick.

AGAINST A PROPER TRIAL BOARD

Of course, since I advocated a change in this ridiculous system of letting policemen try policemen, Fitzpatrick had to recommend against the plan. Here is what he put in his report:

Police-trial board: The police-trial board in many respects is much like an Army court martial. The problems involved are peculiar to the type of service. The committee does not feel that the average civilian would be adequately equipped, either from the standpoint of background or interest in the service. * * * On the other hand, Inspector Lamb, the ranking police official of the traffic bureau, and others insist that it would be a grave error to decentralize the bureau.

Yet Major Brown, superintendent of police, writes me that he favors my proposal, and the Commissioners testified before our Committee on Appropriations that they favored it, yet, because Lamb says "no" the "doctor" says "no."

But there will be no real law enforcement in the District of Columbia until there is a proper trial board and a means provided for getting rid of the crooked policemen on the force, which demoralize the entire force.

REPORT ABSOLUTELY WORTHLESS AND SHOULD BE JUNKED

If there were no other reason for throwing this worthless report in the wastebasket, it should be placed there because of the recommendation of "Doctor" Fitzpatrick that the Park Police force should be united with the Metropolitan. That is a ridiculous proposal, when anyone knows the history of why the Park Police was created. Here is Fitzpatrick's recommendation on that:

Without in any wise casting any reflections upon the personnel or efficiency of the United States Park Police, the subcommittee finds that the activity of the United States Park Police in the District of Columbia is substantially identical with that being performed by the Metropolitan Police department. This conclusion is indisputable in the light of the data contained in the table showing the character of police work performed by members of the United States Park Police force in the District of Columbia for the fiscal year of 1934, and which table may be found in the appendix (exhibit I).

While the Metropolitan Police department has concurrent jurisdiction over the areas in the District of Columbia now patrolled by the United States Park Police, there is a tendency, because of the divided responsibility, for the Metropolitan Police to neglect these areas. This is not conducive to efficient police administration. The subcommittee is unable to find any logical reason for the maintenance of these two separate forces and it recommends that the personnel of the United States Park Police, doing duty within the territorial limitations of the District of Columbia, be merged with and placed under the command of the Metropolitan Police department, care being taken to preserve the rights of those transferred.

During my first service in Congress, I went wild over the idea of consolidating the two forces. I introduced a bill to accomplish it. I caused extensive hearings on it. Then I had a long conference with Col. U. S. Grant, 3d, who took me to his office and showed me the history and records. Then I had a talk with the President then in the White House. And I learned something about the Park Police that was far more important than economy. It meant much to the Government of the United States. And I changed my mind. And "Doctor" Fitzpatrick has another guess coming, if he thinks he will ever consolidate the two forces, for when the new Members of this Congress learn all about why we need a Park Police force, such a consolidation measure would not get more than a handful of votes.

NATIONAL PARK SERVICE ATTACKS FITZPATRICK'S SILLY REPORT

I quote the following from the Washington Star of yesterday, May 1, 1935:

C. Marshall Finnan, superintendent of National Capital Parks, also expressed opposition to a recommendation in the report for the merger of the United States Park Police with the Metropolitan department. He insisted that even if the two forces are combined the Federal Government would still have to maintain a separate police force to patrol Federal property outside the District, such as the George Washington Memorial Parkway and the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway.

Regrets recommendation

"The parks office regrets this recommendation was made", Finnan said. "We feel that the absorption of the Park Police by the Metropolitan Police would, in the course of time, work to the detriment of the park system and would certainly complicate administrative problems. An independent force would still have to be maintained for the large acreage of our jurisdiction, but not within the District of Columbia.

"The question might logically be raised of any economy, as the parks are now policed by the very minimum number of men, and this would mean the retention of that number on the Metropolitan force if the parks were to be given proper attention.

"It is a matter of record in our files that every major city in the United States, with two exceptions, has opposed the consolidation of park police with the city police, and in cities where it has been tried, in most cases it has been unsuccessful."

FOR THE BENEFIT OF FITZPATRICK AND WASHINGTON NEWSPAPERS

The following is from one of the best known Texans, who has spent many years in Washington, in and around both the House and Senate:

DALLAS, TEX., March 21, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: The newspapers indicate that you have again offended the Washingtonians. The manifestations of this disapproval of the inhabitants of the District force the conclusion that you are correct in your position, and as one of your good friends I am inclined to urge that you "stay in there and pitch."

With every good wish, and hoping to hear from you if you have time to write, I am

Cordially yours,

HOMER D. WADE,
Executive Secretary Texas Cooperative Council.

"WILL WORK A REAL INJUSTICE"

I have just received the following letter from Mr. Henry J. Klein, a Washington business man, who says that this unjust action proposed against Inspector Headley would "have a very demoralizing effect on every man" in the Metropolitan Police department, and there are 1,306 uniformed men in it;

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOS. L. BLANTON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please do not permit the report of the Crime Subcommittee to become effective and dismiss the members of the police department who have for many years capably served the people of Washington.

I have known Inspector Headley for many years, and I think if action like that proposed is made it will work a real injustice to the man, and also have a very demoralizing effect on every man in the department.

Thanking you for your consideration, I am,

Yours very truly,

HENRY J. KLEIN.

PRAISING WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST IN NEW JERSEY

Hon. MARY T. NORTON, of New Jersey, chairman, and her Committee on the District of Columbia, in its executive meeting on Wednesday morning, May 1, 1935, specifically ordered that the newspapers of Washington should not print the unapproved report prepared by Mr. John R. Fitzpatrick and Mr. Seals for the crime subcommittee, until her committee could have the voluminous hearings printed and could have time to read and digest same. Yet that evening, wholly ignoring and in contemptuous disregard and disobedience of said District Committee's wishes and orders, Hearst's Washington Times printed said unapproved report. And at the very time Hearst's Washington Times carrying such unapproved report was being sold that night on the streets of Washington, the subcommittee chairman, Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, was lauding and praising William Randolph Hearst in New Jersey, the home State of his committee chairman. Hearst's Washington Herald the next morning, May 2, 1935, under large headlines "Hearst Lauded by RANDOLPH" carried the following item:

PATERSON, N. J., May 1.—Hearst's newspapers were praised tonight by Representative RANDOLPH of West Virginia, in an address here before New Jersey Democrats.

And in Hearst's Washington Times for May 2, 1935, there was another mention made of Representative RANDOLPH having "lauded Hearst", and having praised Hearst's newspapers in an address in Paterson, N. J., before New Jersey Democrats.

And in that same issue of Hearst's Herald of May 2, 1935, on pages 8 and 9 thereof, Hearst devoted 2 entire full pages, 8 columns each, in carrying in full this unapproved report prepared by Mr. Fitzpatrick, right in the face of the District Committee's order that it should not be published until the District Committee passed on it.

And to show that Hearst's newspapers knew that Chairman NORTON and her District Committee had ordered said report prepared by Mr. Fitzpatrick not to be printed by them, the Herald for May 2, 1935, quoted Hon. MARY T. NORTON, Chairman of the District Committee, as follows:

CHAIRMAN'S STATEMENT

In view of the wide-spread importance and interest in this report and in order that proper consideration may be given to the report, it was the consensus of opinion that the hearings be printed immediately; and pending the printing of these hearings no action will be taken on the report.

And this same issue of the Herald quoted Representative RANDOLPH as follows:

JENNINGS RANDOLPH, chairman of the special committee, left town as soon as the report was made public, but before going he issued the following statement:

"In the conduct of the investigation the special committee had the aid and assistance of the five Washington newspapers." * * *

Showing that William Randolph Hearst's Washington Herald and Washington Times at least had something to do with the subcommittee action.

The Washington Post for May 2, 1935, under big headlines, "Report Urging Ouster of Garnett and Police Held up by Committee", and under the following subheadlines, "Copies Put Under Lock and Key", said:

The committee made an attempt to prevent publication of the report by newspapers and instructed Chairman NORTON to inform the press that the report would not be released until the committee approved it.

All undistributed copies of the report were placed under lock and key immediately after the meeting, and Mrs. NORTON said she would not give copies even to Members of Congress not on the District Committee.

And in the face of having knowledge that said Fitzpatrick report had not been approved but was being kept under lock and key away from even Members of Congress, and that the committee had ordered they be not printed, the Washington Post went right ahead and printed said unapproved report, in contemptuous disregard of the District Committee's orders.

WASHINGTON TIMES DEVOTES ABOUT 4 PAGES

In the early "Wall Street" edition of the Washington Times, May 1, 1935, it printed a picture of Representative JENNINGS RANDOLPH, who it said "submits long-awaited subcommittee's report to the District Committee today", with a large heading, "Fireworks", just above, and said:

Washington police, court, and crime circles waited expectantly today for the publication of the crime report of the special subcommittee of the House District Committee.

Speculation and rumors as to the contents of the report have been rampant for the past month, but Representative MARY T. NORTON, Chairman of the District Committee, has requested her committee not to discuss the details or general character of it until the full committee completes its consideration of the matter at noon today.

The subcommittee hearings were marked by frequent clashes between John R. Fitzpatrick, counsel for the subcommittee, and the witness. Mr. Fitzpatrick wrote the report adopted by the subcommittee.

Outbreak after outbreak arose during the questioning of District Attorney Garnett, and one of the stormiest sessions occurred when Representative THOMAS BLANTON, of Texas, appeared voluntarily before the committee to give his views on the "gentlemen's agreement" by which he expected to see Inspector Albert J. Headley promoted to Assistant Superintendent of Police.

And then in its "home" edition that afternoon the Washington Times devoted much of its front page, all of page 8, all of page 9, and most of page 10 in printing said unauthorized, unapproved, scurrilous Fitzpatrick report in full.

LADY INSULTED BY DRUNKEN NEWSPAPER REPORTER

Just what kind of order did "Doctor" Fitzpatrick keep at this hearing? The following article, published by William Randolph Hearst's Herald on Sunday, March 30, 1935, told about an insult offered to Mrs. Harvey Wiley, the widow of the great pure-food crusader, she being one of the leading ladies of Washington:

In the District Crime Committee the other eve Mrs. Harvey Wiley was discussing problems.

It was an evening session and across the table from Mrs. Wiley, ardent dry as she is, sat a somewhat inebriated gentleman of the press.

Each time as Mrs. Wiley looked his way she discovered that his eyes were gazing intently at her.

Mrs. Wiley has lived around Washington for many, many years and has seen many reporters, but not one who followed her every word as did this particular one.

Mrs. Wiley concluded.

The man across the way, still inebriated, announced in a loud tone:

"I could love you if you weren't a prohibitionist."

Mrs. Wiley almost tumbled off her chair in amazement.

The meeting broke up.

INSPECTOR ALBERT J. HEADLEY'S ARMY OF FRIENDS

I will say, without fear of contradiction, that Inspector Headley has as many true, loyal, faithful friends among the honest, substantial citizens of Washington, as any one of the 435 Congressmen have faithful friends in their districts back home.

I wish my colleagues could see all of the letters I have received from Headley's friends. Because the matter is such an important one, and this report unjustly and unfairly censures him without cause, and seeks to ruin him, after 39 years of honest, faithful, efficient service, I deem it of enough importance to the integrity of Congress and to the integrity of the District of Columbia Committee, which can remove this blight from him by refusing to adopt this scandalous report, to put in the RECORD now a fair cross-section of the many letters I have received.

Two thousand pages of hearings are being printed by the committee, reflecting upon an honest United States attorney, an honest superintendent of police, and an honest inspector of police, and their good reputation is at stake, and a scandalous report of 55 printed pages has been published in full in the Washington newspapers before it has been approved, so it is only just to these officials, and to the Democratic administration, and to the Congress, and to the District of Columbia Committee, that I publish a fair cross-section of what the business men of Washington think about the matter.

CROSS-SECTION OF LETTERS

FAUNCE & BROOKE CO.,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE AND DEAR SIR: According to the public press, I have observed that the so-called "Crime Committee" has cast reflection on the good names and services of our Hon. Leslie C. Garnett, the United States attorney for District of Columbia, and that fine police officer, Inspector Albert J. Headley. I believe this censure has done a grave injustice to these good men, one of whom I have known for 40 years, and I believe that by the action of this committee and the published reports of their findings has done only one thing, and that is demoralize the Washington police force, who have rendered faithful and satisfactory service to the citizens of Washington.

I write this letter to you because I believe you are the only man in Congress who can rectify this condition.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANCIS I. BROOKE.

POWELL TRANSPORTATION CO.,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
United States Capitol, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Recently what has been spoken of as a "crime committee" has been engaged in an investigation here in Washington.

One of the results seems to have been the weakening of the faith and loyalty of the rank and file of our police department for its superior officers and leaders. This is the backbone of our police department, or any department or group, and must not be broken.

When a man has devoted half or more of his life to the conscientious service of the citizens of the District of Columbia, or any other community, it seems to me that those citizens owe to the man a loyalty and respect which should be proof against whispered, unproven, unjustified critical propaganda such as seems to be infecting our whole Nation today.

Therefore, I sincerely trust that you, who are in a position to appreciate and to guide toward a just termination matters of this nature in District affairs, will endeavor to have the name of Albert J. Headley associated with his actual record as an honest, efficient, fearless police officer, which he has certainly been from the day when he first ran a beat to his present position of increased responsibility and trust, rather than with rumors and suggestions of unknown or questionable origin.

This should materially help others in the department to keep faith in the strength and importance of their records and reputations.

Upon several occasions my organization has needed special help and protection from the police department. At these times I have found Inspector Headley courteously and efficiently ready to aid us.

I am mighty glad that we have Albert Headley and so many other splendid chaps like him on the force of our police department.

Respectfully yours,

LESTER B. POWELL.

COLUMBIAN CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: Just a few words concerning Inspector Headley. I have known him for over 20 years and always found him a model officer. He was not of the meddling disposition that so often exasperate our citizens. His kindly consideration toward those of high and low degree was a splendid example to others on the force.

I once served as foreman of the grand jury of the District for 3 months and among the witnesses called there was Inspector Headley. His straightforward, businesslike manner of giving his testimony was a subject of frequent comment and approval among the jurors.

I feel that the comments on him in the report of the subcommittee was an honest mistake on the part of its members so I hope you will be able to set the matter right and prevent a great injustice to a very worthy citizen.

Very respectfully,

D. A. EDWARDS.

ST. DOMINIC'S PRIORY,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE AND DEAR SIR: Like all other public servants, a Congressman is supposed to be more or less inured to criticism. Nevertheless, he must be, on the other hand, human enough to appreciate a word of commendation for the conscientious efforts he has expended in behalf of those he has pledged himself to serve.

In this brief communication I wish to commend you highly for the very personal, as well as for the official interest you have taken in matters pertinent to the District.

From my more than cursory reading of the crime situation here I cannot but conclude that its committee has neither ferreted out the real cause for its investigation nor can it then offer the proper remedy. To particularize, I can cite the case against Inspector Albert J. Headley, who for the past several weeks has been subjected to a most unfair and unwarranted severity. To the legion of friends he has made during his many years in the police department this must come, not only as a keen disappointment in the awarding of promotion, but even as a travesty on justice. Indeed, I fear its repercussions will be felt by the entire department.

I sincerely hope that your efforts for the uplift and improvement of the District will never be abated, and that in the near future many of them will be guerdoned with success.

With every sincere good wish, I remain,

Respectfully yours,

Very Rev. ROBERT CARROLL, O. P.,

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am taking the liberty to write you regarding the criticism given Inspector Albert J. Headley by the so-called "Crime Committee."

I have known Inspector Headley all my life and have always found him to be a fair, honest worker for the police department, and cannot feel that this committee is fair in making the accusations that they have against him.

It seems to me that since Inspector Headley has served so many years on the police force, it is very bad form to so severely and unjustly censure him.

If you can in any way prevent the recommendations of the committee from being carried out it will be greatly appreciated. The committee's action has demoralized the police force.

Thanking you, I am

Very truly yours,

CHISLEY'S FLORIST,
Washington, D. C., May 3, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: After reading the detailed report of the Crime Committee in the Washington Times, I think this committee has demoralized the Metropolitan Police department by condemning such leaders as Maj. E. W. Brown and Inspector A. J. Headley after their long years of service.

In my judgment, as a citizen of this city, I hope that the full Congress will set aside such findings and allow these men to remain in office and be given an opportunity to prove to the city that they are good leaders and will bolster up the department 100 percent. I, personally, do not think the crime situation in this city is as bad as is painted by our committees in Congress. Hold the old-line officers, if possible, and satisfy a taxpayer and citizen.

Respectfully,

CHAS. O. CHISLEY.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,

MY DEAR SIR: Inasmuch as you have taken an active interest in affairs that concern the citizens of the District of Columbia, I am selecting you as the proper Member of Congress to voice my objections against the report of the Crime Committee with reference to Inspector Albert J. Headley.

For your information, I beg to advise that I have known this gentleman for a great number of years. He is, in my opinion, a very efficient and capable officer, and a credit to the police department.

Anything you can do in his behalf will be appreciated by me.

Thanking you in advance, I am,

Very truly yours,

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE: I am taking this opportunity to express my appreciation of your interest in the affairs of the District of Columbia and to endorse the stand you have taken on the action of the House subcommittee. I do not see that the committee has developed the real situation in reference to the so-called "crime" in the District. The treatment accorded Inspector Albert J. Headley at the hands of the committee is to be deplored, and the ultimate result is the break-down of the morale of the Metropolitan Police department.

I sincerely hope that your efforts will be successful in the undoing of the wrong done by the committee to the parties singled out in its report and indirectly to the citizens of our city.

Very sincerely,

ALFRED M. COPELAND.

Hon. T. L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have kept in touch with the congressional police investigation through the newspapers, and it is my opinion the real facts have never been published.

After 39 years of public service and with a record such as to gain for him his high position in the District of Columbia Police Department, it seems to me Inspector Albert J. Headley has been subjected to as gross an injustice and as much humiliation as any man in our past public city service.

I trust you, with your knowledge of city affairs and high standing in public life, may be able to clean up the present conditions and see that Inspector Headley gets a square deal.

Very truly yours,

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I wish to express to you my condemnation of the action of the Crime Committee in censuring Inspector Albert J. Headley, whom I have known for 40 years, a man against whom no one can speak ill. He was picked out of 1,300 policemen to censure, and the action of this committee has demoralized the police force.

I hope you will do something about it.

ACCO PRODUCTS, INC.,

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been following very closely the so-called "crime investigation" being conducted by the House subcommittee. To date the committee seems to be dealing more in personalities than in actual crime.

I want to take this opportunity of telling you that I agree heartily with the stand you have taken.

It is my regret that such a fine officer as Inspector Albert J. Headley should be subjected to the humiliation he has received from the subcommittee.

Very sincerely yours,

J. KIP EDWARDS, District Manager.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In reference to the report of the Crime Committee investigating crime conditions in the District of Columbia and in regards to the unfair criticism about Inspector Albert J. Headley:

I have known Mr. Headley for many years and am positive that he is honest and efficient in the performance of his duties. After so many years of faithful service as a police officer, I think the criticism to the inspector is unjust and demoralizing to the police department of the District of Columbia, upon which the good citizens have to depend upon for protection.

Anything you can do to assisting in righting this wrong done to Inspector Headley will be greatly appreciated by,

Yours very truly,

RAYMOND C. BRIGGS, General Manager.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives,

DEAR SIR: I have known Inspector Albert J. Headley for many years since he was a private, and feel that he does not deserve the unfair criticism by the Crime Committee. He has always been a fair, honest officer and entitled to fairer treatment.

DISTRICT HOTEL SUPPLY CO.,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regards the present criticism of Inspector Headley, we wish to state that we have known Inspector Headley as an officer for the past 30 years, and at all times during that period we have considered him as an officer of exceptional efficiency and one who has always conducted himself in such a manner as to bring only honor and credit to the department.

We consider Inspector Headley and any other officer of his caliber a credit to the Metropolitan Police force. We feel that an officer through his constant and faithful service should be rewarded at least as an example to the younger members of our police force as encouragement to them to seek promotion justly earned by efficient and faithful service.

We feel that the example now being set by disregarding the knowledge obtained by these many years of active police duty is very disastrous to the morale of the department, and trust that those in charge will at least afford Inspector Headley that which he justly deserves.

Respectfully yours,

CHAS. N. BIONDI.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE CONGRESSMAN: The writer has had the pleasure of knowing Inspector A. J. Headley for a number of years and knows that he is very efficient in executing his duty, and that his integrity is beyond reproach. Therefore I feel that there would be a very serious mistake made in removing the inspector from the Metropolitan Police department at this time.

A reconsideration of retaining Mr. Headley would not only be appreciated by the writer but also by thousands of others here in Washington.

Yours very truly,

J. T. RICHARDS, President.

Hon. T. L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: As a native Washingtonian, I have kept in close touch, through the newspaper, with the House subcommittee report of its crime investigation and it is my personal opinion that this committee has not achieved its purpose but has only dealt in personalities.

Inspector Albert J. Headley has given close to 40 years of honest and intelligent service to this city.

I feel that the House subcommittee has erred in attacking this veteran official.

Knowing of your interest in the affairs of the District I sincerely hope that your efforts will be successful in combating the further destruction of the morale of the Metropolitan Police department which, in my opinion, has been the actual and sole result of the investigation as conducted by this so-called "Crime Investigating Committee."

Yours truly,

A. J. AGRICOLA.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have been following the newspaper reports of the Crime Committee closely in the newspapers. At the beginning I thought it a good idea, but when the final report of the committee was drafted condemning Major Brown and Inspector Headley (whom I have known for over 30 years, personally) I could not see any benefit to the District.

You have been an active Member of Congress for years and most active in the matters concerning our police force, and am sure you can see no good in the final report of the Crime Committee.

Trusting the affairs of the Metropolitan Police and the District affairs will not be hampered by any of the findings of this committee, I remain,

Respectfully,

G. HOWARD DUNNINGTON,
Mid-City Citizens' Association.

RIGHT HONORABLE SIR: Recognizing you as an outstanding Member of Congress I wish to express my condemnation of the treatment accorded our Inspector Headley, when he was on the stand before the so-called "Crime Committee."

I wish also to condemn the Crime Committee because, by its action, it has demoralized our police force, for whom Washington people hold a high regard.

Very truly yours,

JULIUS KATZMAN.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I desire to convey to you my disapproval of the recommendations of the so-called "Congressional District Crime Committee."

It is my personal opinion that the investigation such as made by the Congressional District Crime Committee tends to do more harm than good. The morale of our police department has been lowered and the respect due to the superior officers has been lessened by this investigation.

I hope, Mr. Congressman, that you will use the power and force of your office to prevent a recurrence of such publicity in the future.

Respectfully yours,

JOSEPH P. BURKE.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,

DEAR SIR: We desire to voice our protest against the report submitted to the House District Committee by its special committee criticizing the ranking officers of the Metropolitan Police department.

We have come in contact with these officers a great number of times and have always found them very efficient in the performance of their duties and they have always given us their full cooperation.

We feel that this report has disrupted the morale of the personnel of the department, and anything you can do to remedy this situation will be to the benefit of the entire community of the District.

Yours very truly,

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: My attention was recently called to a Crime Committee investigating local crime and the enforcement of our laws.

I cannot help but condemn this committee in the manner it had gone about its duty in practically ruining the morale of the Metropolitan Police department and its condemnation of Inspector Headley. I have known the inspector for many years and have always regarded him as an outstanding enforcer of law and duty to our city.

As a loyal Democrat, a fellow citizen, and an American I beg of you to stand by Inspector Headley.

Respectfully yours,

JOSEPH G. KATZMAN.

FRED J. WHITE IRON WORKS,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: By reading the reports in the newspaper of the Crime Committee, I see they have criticized some of the police officials most severely, especially Inspector Headley, whom I have known for a great number of years. I consider him one of the best police officers I have ever known; he is most thorough and conscientious.

This, in my opinion, has a tendency to not only demoralize these officers but breaks down the morale of the entire police department, which I believe is very detrimental to the safety of the citizens of Washington.

I am, very truly yours,

FRED J. WHITE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1935.

The Honorable THOS. L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: Your comments in defense and support of the police department are to be commended.

The report of the Congressional Crime Committee is deplorable and wholly unjust in its criticism of our police officials. Such unfounded charges will cause a demoralization of our police force and can lead only to insubordination and inefficiency.

May you be successful in your fight for our honest and efficient officials, and may confidence be restored in their ability and integrity.

Sincerely yours,

MARTIN WIEGAND.

WASHINGTON D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE AND DEAR SIR: I have noticed in the public press the so-called "Crime Committee" have finished its task, and in so doing have censured our Inspector Headley, whom I have known for 30 years as an upstanding police officer who has merited his promotions by his close attention to duty and against whom never has scandal been directed. I remember when the Shriners last visited Washington in 1923 that there was not a single mishap when Inspector Headley was responsible for traffic at that time, and there was no traffic bureau in existence at that time.

I want to criticize the committee for demoralizing the police force by what I consider unjust criticism. As a citizen of the District for the past 50 years, I ask that Inspector Headley as well as the Metropolitan Police be relieved of such persecution.

Very truly yours,

MARCUS NOTES.

DEAR JUDGE: I am taking this opportunity to express my appreciation of your interest in the affairs of the District of Columbia and to endorse the stand you have taken on the action of the House subcommittee. I do not see that the committee has developed the real situation in reference to the so-called "crime" in the District. The treatment accorded Inspector Albert J. Headley at the hands of the committee is to be deplored, and the ultimate result is the break-down of the morale of the Metropolitan Police force.

I sincerely hope that your efforts will be successful in the undoing of the wrong done by the committee to the parties singled out in its report, and indirectly to the citizens of our fair city.

Very sincerely,

DEAR SIR: My attention has been attracted through the public press censuring Inspector Albert J. Headley, of the Metropolitan Police department and several others.

The writer has personally known Inspector Headley for many years, and have always known him as a fearless and efficient policeman and police official who has rendered to this community faithful service for almost 40 years.

Therefore, Mr. Congressman, I make this personal appeal, that you may at your first favorable opportunity invite the attention of the proper persons to the above and, therefore, afford to this faithful official the right to remain in the Metropolitan Police department.

Thanking you, I beg to remain,

Most respectfully,

MY DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: I wish heartily to express appreciation of your efforts toward bringing out all of the facts in connection with the recently concluded investigation of crime conditions in the District of Columbia by a subcommittee of the House of Representatives.

Your loyal defense of the efficiency, loyalty, and character of Inspector Albert J. Headley will be approved by every good citizen. It is hoped that the final report of the District Committee will do full justice to the quality of the services of this conscientious officer, for his retirement from active service would benefit only the denizens of the underworld.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I want to take this means of condemning the action of the so-called "Crime Committee" in their unfair criticism of Inspector Headley and United States Attorney Garnett. The treatment of them was harsh and unfair.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: As a local citizen and taxpayer, it is a pleasure to make this acknowledgment of your commendable attitude during the recent investigation by the Subcommittee on Crime Conditions in the District of Columbia.

Until the time of your appearance before the investigators, the tactics pursued and the quality of the evidence adduced by the overzealous subcommittee prosecutor indicated a desire to air personal grievances and petty official jealousies rather than to serve the purpose for which the investigation was designed. Old time Washington residents appreciate the timeliness and the justness of your condemnation of the methods pursued. They particularly are pleased with the deserved tributes you later paid on the floor of the House to the efficient and honorable services of officials of the character of Inspector Albert J. Headley.

I have always admired Inspector Headley's organizing ability and discriminating judgment, and I do not believe anyone can doubt his probity and trustworthiness.

Civic pride prompts the hope that such men will not be thoughtlessly sacrificed on the verdict of what seems to have been an opera bouffe performance rather than a dignified congressional investigation of a serious situation.

Very truly yours,

DEAR SIR: Allow me to take this opportunity to express my appreciation of your keen interest in the affairs of the District of Columbia. I also heartily indorse the stand taken by you in regard to the action of the House subcommittee.

I cannot see how by their action they have accomplished their purpose in straightening out the so-called "crime" in the District. I cannot agree with their treatment accorded Inspector Albert J. Headley, which seems to have resulted in the breaking down of the morale in the department.

Whereas my personal association with Inspector Headley for the past 12 years proves to me his outstanding qualities as an officer of the Metropolitan Police department, my investigation of the 27 years prior to my acquaintance leads me to believe that he has been most unjustly treated in the hands of the committee.

I do hope your efforts will be successful in the undoing of the wrong done to Inspector Albert J. Headley, whose reputation, as I know, is irreproachable.

Very truly yours,

THOS. E. HOPWOOD.

I do not see that the committee has uncovered the real situation in reference to the so-called "crime" in the District. The treatment accorded our Inspector Albert J. DEAR SIR: As an observer of your interest in the affairs of the people of the District of Columbia, may I say a word in appreciation of such.

Especially in regards to the investigation of the House subcommittee of the Metropolitan Police department, do you show us what you really stand for!

The stones thrown at such a splendidly charactered and efficient officer as Inspector Albert J. Headley certainly are misaimed and may they never reach their mark.

This officer, who has been so unjustly brought upon the proverbial carpet, has, to my own knowledge, been a real policeman for the many years that I have known and observed him—always efficient, courteous, and righteous—never a blemish on his record.

This also applies to our good superintendent of police, Major Ernest Brown.

As you know, these two men were elevated to their present positions in the days when push instead of pull was the stepping stone to success, and you may easily see that they have kept up their good work.

May the subcommittee in their investigation find the real cause of the trouble on hand and wholly exonerate these two splendid officers.

Thanking you again, I am,

Yours respectfully,

SIR: The findings of the Crime Committee have been made public and after everything is now over, what has been accomplished? They censure Inspector Headley, a veteran policeman, and ask for removal of Major Brown. Instead of investigating crime conditions, they magnify the small things of the department, demoralizing the officials and the patrolmen.

May I congratulate you on your efforts in behalf of Inspector Headley and the police department as a whole? Always in the past you have shown a deep interest in the department and the affairs of the District.

Trusting the findings of the Crime Committee will be ignored as far as Major Brown and Inspector Headley are concerned, and with best wishes for your continued success, I am, HONORED AND DEAR SIR: In reading the public press I have followed up the reports of the actions of the Crime Committee, and I am certainly disappointed in the results after 2 months' investigation. I believe they went out of their way to criticize our United States Attorney, Mr. Garnett, and the people of Washington surely know that they did make a serious mistake in censuring our Inspector Albert J. Headley, whom I have known for a great many years, and is an outstanding officer and has grown to be a veteran on the police force.

There is only one result of this investigation to seriously interfere with the morale of our police force, who appear to be very much disturbed, which affects the good service that they should be rendering. Knowing you to be deeply interested in the welfare of the city of Washington I earnestly hope that you will do something to prevent any mark of demerit on the good record of Inspector Headley.

This is in reference to the so-called "crime wave", and the treatment of Inspector Albert J. Headley, who has put in at least 39 years of service. Washington, D. C., May 4, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is just a letter to you, personally, condemning the investigation and report of the Crime Subcommittee. It is almost unbelievable that any group of Congressmen would or could have the audacity to recommend the dismissal of members of our police force who have so valiantly served the interests of the people of Washington. It is obvious that a Member of Congress is only here for a few years and the positions attained by the members of the police department who are to be dismissed could only be had by many, many years of faithful service.

I, for one, hope that you will do your utmost to stop this outrageous plan.

Inspector Headley has been known by me for many years, and I have always found him an honor and credit to our police department.

Yours very truly,

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] in position to tell us what the program will be for Monday?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in order that the consideration of the banking bill may be resumed as early as possible, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday next be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I may say to the Members that bills on the Consent Calendar will be taken up Monday. There are over 200 bills on that calendar. Bills on the Private Calendar will be taken up on Tuesday, and there are over 300 of them.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the gentleman know of any business to be taken up other than that mentioned by the gentleman?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. I do not know of any other business.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STUBBS, for 2 weeks, on account of illness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, May 6, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

317. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated May 3, 1935, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers and illustrations, on a preliminary examination of Stillaguamish River and tributaries, Wash., authorized by the acts of Congress approved February 26, 1925, and June 13, 1934; to the Committee on Flood Control.

318. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting two tables showing the cost and other data with respect to Indian irrigation projects as compiled to the end of the fiscal year June 30, 1934; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. ASHBROOK: Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. H. R. 6717. A bill to amend section 1 of the act of July 8, 1932; with amendment (Rept. No. 823). Referred to the House Calendar.
